"I will remedy this gear ere long!"
Shakespeare: Henry VI., Pt. II., iii. 1.

*8. Manner; habits; customs.

"Wyss me fro my wyld gerys."
Penitential Psalms, p. 23.

*9. Anything of no value; rubbish; trash. (Latimer.)

II. Technically:

1. Machinery:

(1) Furniture, rigging, tackle (jeers), apparatus, and appurtenances of an implement: e. g., expansion-gear, valve-gear, pump-gear, plow-gear; the working-parts of a locomotive; the rigging of a spar or sail; the running parts of a wheeled vehicle, as the fore-gears, hind-gears, referring to the fore-axle and its wheels, the hind-axle and its wheels. To the former is attached the tongue and fore hounds, to the latter the hind hounds. Each carries its bolster. The term is also applied to other mechanical devices by which motion is transmitted; as change-gear, chain-gear, back-gear, overhead-gear; or by which parts are operated, as hoisting-gear.

(2) A cog-wheel. [GEARING.]

*2. Naut.: A general term for the ropes, blocks, &c., belonging to any particular sail or spar; as, the mainsail gear, &c.

(1) Running gear:

Naut.: Running rigging.

(2) Pump-gear, windlass-gear: The tackle belonging to the pumps, windlass, &c.

(3) To throw anything out of gear:

(a) Lit.: To disconnect gearing or couplings.

(b) Fig.: To cause anything not to work smoothly; to disturb.

"The most important body of facts with which history makes us acquainted is thrown out of gear."
Mait: Bases of Belief, pt. iv., § 14.

gear-cutter, s. A machine for making cog-wheels by cutting out the material between the teeth.

gear-gatherer, subst. A money-making man. (Scott.)

gear-wheel, s. Any cog-wheel, whether crown, spur, internal-cogged, bevel, or lantern, is a gear-wheel. The essential feature is the possession of cogs, which act upon the cogs of another wheel in the train or series to impart or transmit motion. [GEARING.]

gēar, *geir, v. t. [GEAR, s.] To dress; to harness; to put gear on.

"That all manner of men . . . be redly horsit and geirit."
Acts James II, (1456), ch. lxii.

gēar-īng, s. [Eng. gear, s.; -ing.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Harness, tackle.

2. Mach.: A train or series of wheels with cogs for transmitting motion; the parts in machinery by which motion is communicated. In spur-gearing the teeth are arranged round either the concave or convex surface of a cylindrical wheel in the direction of radii from the center of the wheel, and are of equal depth throughout. In beveled-gearing the teeth are placed upon the exterior periphery of a conical wheel in a direction converging to the apex of the cone, and the depth of the teeth gradually diminishes from the base.

gearing-chain, s.

Mach.: An endless chain transmitting motion from one toothed wheel to another.

gearing-rails, s. pl. The ladder-like rails at the side of a cart or wagon; the raves.

gē-ark-sū-tite, s. [Gr. gē=earth, and Eng. &c., arkutite (q. v.).]

Min.: A dull white, earthy mineral, like kaolin. Composition: Fluorine 41.18, aluminum 13.75, lime 19.25, soda 2.46, water 20.22. Occurs in Greenland with cryolite. (Dana.)

gēar-mōnt, s. [Eng. gear; -ment.] Rubbish, trash.

gēas-ōn, geaz-on, *ges-on, *ges-oun, s. [A. S. gāse=empty, barren.] Scarce, uncommon, unusual.

"The lady, hearkning of his sensefull speech, Found nothing that he said vnmeet nor geason."
Spenser: F. Q., vi. iv. 37.

gē-as-tēr, gē-as-trūm, s. [Gr. gē=the earth, and astēr=a star. So called from the stellate appearance of the species when burst and lying on the ground.]

bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, cell, chorus, chin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f.
-cian, -tian = shān. -tion, -sion = shūn; -tion, -sion = zhūn. -tious, -cious, -sious = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl.

Bot.: Earth stars. A genus of gasteromycetous fungi, sub-order Trichogasteres. It was formed by Micheli to include the Puffballs having a stellated volva. They are small fungi, often of a brown color. Geaster hygrometricus, as the name implies, readily absorbs and retains moisture.

geat (1), s. [A. S. geotan=to pour; Low German geten.]

Found.: The hole or channel through which molten metal descends into the mold.

geat (2), s. [JER.]

geave, v. i. [Etym. doubtful.] To look in an unsteady manner.

"Callant, clap the lid down on the pat; what hae they? hingin' geaving up there for?"—Perils of Man, i. 55.

gē-bāng, s. [A Javanese word.]

Bot.: (For def. see compound.)

Bot.: Corypha gebanga. It is a native of Java, where the leaves are used for thatching, plaiting, &c., and the root for diarrhoea, while a kind of sago is prepared from the interior of the trunk.

geb-bie, gab-bie, s. [Fr. jabot.] The crop or craw of a bird.

gē-bī-a, s. [Gr. gē=the earth, and bia=strength, force, power, might.]

Zool.: A genus of long-tailed decapodous Crustaceans, family Thalassinidae. Type Gebia stellata, a crab about an inch and a half long.

Gē-bēr, s. [GUEBRE.]

gē-car-ql-nī-dā, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. gecarcin(us), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -ide.]

Zoology: Land Crabs. A family of short-tailed Crustaceans, containing various tropical land crabs. They live often at a distance from the sea in dry woods in burrows, which they excavate, sallying forth by night in quest of food. At a certain season they migrate in numbers to the sea to deposit their eggs.

gē-car-ql-nūs, s. [Gr. gē=land, and karkinos=a crab.]

Zool.: Land Crab. The typical genus of the family Gecarcinidae (q. v.).

gē-ql-nī-nā, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. gecin(us), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -ina.]

Ornith.: A sub-family of Picidae (Woodpeckers), established by Mr. George R. Gray, in which the ridge of the bill is near its dorsal line. Type, Gecinus (q. v.).

gē-ql-nūs, s. [Gr. gē=the earth, and kineō=to move.]

Ornith.: The typical genus of the sub-family Gecininae (q. v.). Gecinus (Picus) viridis is the Green Woodpecker. [WOODPECKER.]

geck, s. [Ger. geck; Dut. gek=a cockcomb, a simpleton. Cf. also A. S. geac=a cuckoo.] [GECK, v., GAWK.]

1. A toss of the head in derision or contempt; a taunt, a gibe.
2. An object of scorn, derision, or contempt; a dupe.

"And to become the geck and scorn

O' the other's villainy."

Shaksp.: Cymbeline, v. 4.

gēck, v. t. & i. [Dan. giecker=to jest, to jeer.] [GECK, s.]

A. Transitive:

1. To deride; to laugh or sneer at.

2. To befool, to cheat, to trick.

"Hame to the Prowest it was directit;

But ye shall heir whow he was geckit.

Legend: Bp. St. Andrews; Poems (16th cent.), p. 336.

B. Intrans.: To sneer, to deride; to manifest contempt or derision.

"During our whole journey she gecked and scorned at my northern speech and habit."—Scott: Antiquary, ch. xxxiii.

gēc-kō, gēk-kō, s. [Fr. gecko; Mod. Lat. gekko, said to be imitated from the sound of the animal's voice.]

Zool.: The typical genus of the family Geckotidae (q. v.). Gecko versus is common in India and the adjacent countries, being often seen on the walls of rooms or running up the window-panes. The spider "which taketh hold with her hands, and is in kings' palaces" (Prov. xxx. 28), seems to be not a genuine arachnid, but a gecko lizard.

gēc-kōt i-dā, s. pl. [Eng., &c., gecko, t connective, and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -ide.]

Zool.: A family of Lacertilia (Lizards), sub-order Pachyglossa. The eyes are large, the tongue not very protrusible, the teeth numerous, the toes furnished below with imbricated plates, or adhesive discs, which exude a viscous fluid. These, acting like the suckers of the domestic fly, enable the animals to walk up panes of glass or go along the ceilings of rooms. They feed on insects. There are many species in the hotter parts of both the Old and the New Worlds. Though reported venomous, they are really harmless. For Gecko versus see Gecko. The Croaking lizard, Thaenadactylus laevis, is common in the boiling-houses on estates in Jamaica.

gēd, gēdd, s. [Icel. gedda; Sw. gadde; cf. Icel. gaddo; A. S. gād=a goad.] [GOAD, s.]

Zool.: The pike. (Scotch.)

"A gedd, or a dish of perch now and then."—Scott: Rob Roy, ch. xxxvi.

gēd-rite, s. [From Gedres, in France, near which it is found.]

Min.: A variety of Anthophyllite, with microscopic black spinels.

gēē, jēē, v. i. [Probably a variant of go (q. v.).] Mahn refers the second and third senses to Fr. dé, used to turn a horse to the left, in Switzerland to the right; Arm. dia, diou; Ir. deas=to the right hand.]

*1. To agree, to fit, to suit.

*2. To go or turn to the off-side; used as a direction to horses.

*3. To move faster; as a teamster cries to his horses, gee-up.

geēse, s. pl. [GOOSE.]

geēst, s. [Low Ger. geest, geestland=dry, sandy land; O. Fris. gēst, gēstland, from gāst=barren.] Alluvial matter on the surface of land, not of recent origin.

geēz, s. [Arabic.] A dialect of Arabic, called also Literary Ethiopic, the ancient language of Abyssinia. It is not now a spoken language, having been superseded by the Amharic. Its literature reaches back to the fourth century.

Gē-hēn-nā, s. [Lat. Gehenna; Gr. Geenna, Gaienna, from Heb. Ge Hinnom, the valley of Hinnom: gai, ge=valley, and Hinnom. (See def.)]

1. Script. Geog.: A valley anciently belonging to a man, Hinnom, of whom nothing is known (Josh. xviii. 6), and inherited by his son or sons, whence it is called the Valley of the Son of Hinnom (Josh. xv. 8), or of the children of Hinnom (2 Kings xxiii. 10). In Joshua it is described as lying south of Jebusi, the Jebusite capital, which afterward became Jerusalem (xviii. 16). Here, during the later period of the Jewish kings, men made their sons and daughters pass through the fire to Molech or Moloch, the Ammonite fire-god (2 Kings xxiii. 10; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 6), or actually burnt them in the fire (2 Chron. xxxiii. 3). Tophet was in it (2 Kings xxiii. 10), and a prophetic passage mentions the size and fierceness of the fires there burning for the "king" [Molech means king] (Isaiah xxx. 33). Josiah put an end to these cruel practices, and defiled the place (2 Kings xxiii. 10). It was doomed afterward to become an overcrowded cemetery (Jer. vii. 32). When the Jews outgrew all love of human sacrifice, they regarded the place with horror, the Rabbins deeming it the gate of hell. [2.] The valley, which the Arabs call Gehennam, is thoroughly known. It is narrow and deep, with rugged limestone cliffs, excavated for tombs, and the mountain sides overtopping all.

"The pleasant valley of Hinnom, Tophet thence And black Gehenna called, the type of Hell."

2. Script. Doctrine: Hell, the place of punishment, the sufferings of the lost being compared to those of the children sacrificed to Molech. [1.]

"Whosoever shall say Thou fool, shall be in danger of the hell of fire (margin, Gr. Gehenna of fire)."—Matt. v. 22 (Revised Version).

gēh-lēn-ite, s. [Ger. gehlenit. Named by Fuchs after his colleague Gehlen.]

Min.: A grayish-green or brown tetragonal mineral; its hardness 5.5 to 6; its specific gravity 2.9 to 3.1; its luster resinous or vitreous; its fracture uneven to splintery. Composition: Silica 29.9; alumina 21.5; sesquioxide of iron 6.6; lime 42.0=100. It has feeble double refraction. It is known native only in the Fassa valley, but occasionally occurs among the scorias of furnaces. (Dana.)

gē-īc, a. [Gr. gē=the earth; -īc.] Earthy, pertaining to or derived from earth; terrene.

geic-acid, s. [ULMIC-ACID.]

gei-ēr-ite, s. [From Geyer in Saxony, where it occurs.]

Min.: The same as Leucopyrite (q. v.).

gē-īne, s. [Gr. gēinos=mortal; subject to decay.] [ULMIN.]

gelz-en, glz-sen, v. i. [Sw. gisna=to dry up; Icel. gisn=dried.] To become dry and shrink for lack of moisture; to wither; to fade.

gēl-a-ble, a. [Lat. gelo=to congeal; gelu=frost.] That may or can be congealed; capable of being converted or congealed into a jelly.

gēl-a-dā, s. [An Abyssinian word (?).]

Zool.: A baboon closely allied to Hamadryas, discovered by Rüppel in Abyssinia, and in consequence named Gelada rüppellii.

gēl-a-lā-ān, adj. [Named after Gelal-u-Din, Sultan of Khorasan.]

Chron.: See etym. and compound.

Chron.: An era introduced by Gelal-u-Din and commencing March 4, A. D. 1079. (Sir Harris Nicolas, &c.)

gē-lās-i-mūs, s. [Gr. gelasimos=laughable, from gelaō=to laugh. What is ludicrous about the matter is to see such marine-looking animals as crabs, &c., and flourishing an abnormally large claw in the face of their foes.]

Zool.: [CALLING CRAB.]

gē-lās-tic, a. & s. [Gr. gelastikos=inclined to laugh; gelaō=to laugh.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to laughter.

B. As subst.: Laughter, merriment.

gēl-a-tig-ēn-ōūs, a. [Eng. gelatine, and Gr. gennao=to produce.] Producing or yielding gelatine.

gelatigenous-tissues, s. pl.

Anat.: Animal tissues which, on being treated with boiling water, yield gelatine. These are the skin, the serous membranes, the cellular sheaths of the muscles, the organic portion of bone, &c.

gē-lāt-i-nāte, v. i. & t. [Eng. gelatin(e); -ate.]

A. Intrans.: To become converted or congealed into a substance like jelly.

B. Trans.: To congeal or convert into a substance like jelly.

gē-lāt-i-nā-tion, s. [Eng. gelatin(e); -ation.] The act or process of converting into a substance like jelly; the state or process of becoming gelatinated.

gēl-a-tine, gēl-a-tin, s. & a. [Fr. gelatine; Sp., Port., & Ital. gelatina, from Lat. gelatus=frozen, pa. par. of gelo=to cause to freeze; gelu=frost, cold.] So named from the tendency which the substance has to congeal and become to a certain extent solid.

A. As substantive:

Chem.: Gelatin, $C_7H_{12}N_2O_{10}$.? Animal glutin, obtained by treating bones with dilute hydrochloric acid, which dissolves the mineral constituents of the bone, consisting of phosphates and carbonates of calcium, magnesium, &c., and leaves the bone cartilage. [OSSEIN.] This, when boiled for a long time with water, dissolves, and forms gelatine, which can be purified by dissolving in hot water and precipitating by alcohol. A pure variety is obtained from the swimming-bladder of the sturgeon, or other species of Acipenser. Impure gelatine, called glue, is prepared by boiling down pieces of hide, horn, hoof, cartilage, &c., with water under pressure. Pure gelatine is amorphous, transparent in thin plates, of a yellowish-white color; it has neither taste nor smell, and is neutral to vegetable colors; it is insoluble in alcohol and in ether. In contact with cold water it swells up, and is soluble in hot water. It is not precipitated by acids, except by tannic acid, which gives a flaky precipitate, which is insoluble in water, alcohol, and ether; this reaction takes place in the formation of leather (q. v.). The aqueous solution of gelatine turns the plane of polarization to the left. Gelatine subjected to dry distillation yields methylvamine, cyanide of ammonium, pyrrrol, &c.; by oxidation with sulphuric acid and manganese dioxide, or with chromic acid mixture, it yields hydrocyanic acid, acids of the fatty series, benzoic aldehyde and benzoic acid, &c. Gelatine boiled with caustic potash yields glycocine and leucine. Gelatine contains about 50 per cent. of carbon, 6.6 of hydrogen, and 18.4 of nitrogen; when pure it probably contains no sulphur. Moist gelatine exposed to the air rapidly putrefies, the liquid becoming first acid, but afterward it gives off ammonia. Dry gelatine is unaltered by the air. Gelatine gives no precipitate with lead acetate, alum, or ferrocyanide of potassium. A mixture of gelatine with potassium dichromate becomes, when exposed to the action of light, insoluble in water.

B. As adj.: Composed of, or in any way connected with gelatine; gelatinous.

gēl-a-tin-i-form, adj. [Eng. gelatin(e); i connective; -form.] Having the form of gelatine; gelatinous.

gē-lāt-in-ize, v. t. & i. [Eng. gelatin(e); -ize.] The same as GELATINATE (q. v.).

gē-lāt-i-nō, in comp. [GELATINE.] Containing gelatine.

gelatino-sulphurous, a. Consisting of gelatine and sulphur.

gē-lāt-i-nō-sī, s. pl. [Masc. pl. of Mod. Lat. gelatinosus=gelatinous.]

Zool.: The name given by Cuvier to his second order of Polypi. He includes under it his genera Hydra, Corine, Cristatella, Vorticella and Pedicularia. (Cuvier, ed. Griffiths.)

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mātē, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; try, sīryan. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

gē-lăt-l-nous, a. [Eng. gelatin(e); -ous.] Of, pertaining to, or consisting of gelatine; resembling, or of the nature or consistency of gelatine; viscous, jelly-like.

"The gelatinous substance being nothing but the half-digested remains of earthworms, on which these birds feed."—Pennant: British Zoology; Common Gull.

Bot.: Lichens having a gelatinous thallus. Examples: Iceland Moss (Cetraria islandica, and Reindeer Moss (Cladonia rangiferina).

gelatinous-tissues, s. pl. [GELATINOUS TISSUES.]

gēld, *gēlt (1), s. [A. S. geld, gild=tribute, custom; O. Sax. geld; O. Fris. geld; O. H. Ger. gelt; Goth. gild; Ger. & Dut. geld=money, tribute.]

1. Money, tribute, compensation, ransom. Generally, in composition, as Danegelt, or Danegeld (q. v.).

"Free from all gets and payments."—Fuller: Waltham Abbey, p. 7.

2. A guild (q. v.).

gēld, *geol-dyn, *gelde, *gel-den, *gel-dyn, *gild, v. t. [Icel. gelda; cogn. with Sw. gälla; Dan. gilde.] [GALT, GELT.]

1. Lit.: To castrate, to emasculate; to deprive of the power of generation.

"Som beeth gildet that gildeth hem self for the kyngdom of God."—Trevise, v. 63.

II. Figuratively:

1. To deprive of any essential part; to mutilate.

"Bereft and gelded of his patrimony."

Shakespeare: Richard II., ii. 1.

2. To clear or free from anything immodest or obscene; to expurgate.

"They were diligent enough to make sure work, and to geld it so clearly in some places, that they took away the very manhood of it."—Dryden: Juvenal. (Pref.)

gēld-ā-ble (1), a. [Eng. geld, v.; -able.] That may or can be gelded.

gēld-ā-ble (2), a. [English geld (1), s.; -able.] Liable to pay taxes.

gēld-ēr (1), geld-ere, s. [Eng. geld, v.; -er.] One who gelds or castrates; a gelding.

"Geld later with gelders, as many one do,
And look of a dozen to geld away two."

Tusser: Husbandrie.

gēld-ēr (2), s. [GUELDER.]

gelder-rose, s. [GUELDER-ROSE.]

gēld-ing, *geld-ing, *geld-yng, *geld-yng, *gēld-ing, pr. par., a. & s. [GELD, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As substantive:

I. Literally:

1. The act of castrating; castration.

2. One who has been gelded or castrated; applied—
*(1) To men, and equivalent to the more modern word eunuch (q. v.).

(2) To animals; specifically, a castrated horse.

II. Fig.: An emasculating or depriving of strength or force.

gē-lēch-l-dæ, s. pl. [Gr. gēlēchēs=sleeping on the ground; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Entom.: A family of Moths, tribe Tineina.

gēl-l-ā-ide, s. [Lat. gelidicius, from gelu= frost, and cado=to fall.] A frost. (Coles.)

gēl-l-id, *gel-ed, a. [Lat. gelidus, from gelu=

frost.] Extremely cold or cool.

"By gelid founts and careless rills to muse."

Thomson: Summer, 208.

gēl-l-d-l-ā-cē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. gelidi(um), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -acēæ.]

Bot.: A family, tribe, or order of rose-spored Algae, and belonging to the group Desmiospermeae, i. e., those bearing necklaces of spores. Some of the foreign species are very beautiful. Type, Gelidium (q. v.).

gēl-l-d-l-tŷ, s. [Eng. gelid; -ity.] The quality or state of being gelid; extreme cold.

gēl-l-d-l-ūm, s. [Dimin. of Lat. gelidus=icy cold, from gelu=icy coldness.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Gelidiaceae (q. v.). Gelidium corneum is a common seaweed with a red pinnated horny frond from two to six or eight inches high.

gēl-l-d-lŷ, adv. [Eng. gelid; -ly.] In an extremely cold manner; coldly, frigidity.

gēl-l-d-nēss, s. [Eng. gelid; -ness.] Extreme cold; gelidity.

gēl-l-n-ē-s, s. pl. [From Lat. gel(o)=to cause to freeze; fem. pl. adj. suff. -inēæ.]

Bot.: Cells in algae secreting vegetable jelly. (Treas. of Bot.)

gell (1), v. i. [Ger. gellen.] To tingle; to thrill with acute pain.

"Your wounds they will both glow and gell, Sow full sore, and be full ill."—Str Egeir, p. 13.

gell (2), v. i. [Icel. geil=a crack, a fissure.] To crack in consequence of heat; a phrase used concerning wood which cracks in drying.

gell (3), v. i. [GALE, v.] To sing loudly; to bawl in singing; to yell.

gēll (4), v. t. & i. [GEAL, v.]

A. Trans.: To form into a jelly, to congeal.

B. Intrans.: To assume the consistence of jelly; to set.

gell (1), s. [Etym. doubtful.] A leech.

gell (2), s. [GELL (2), v.] A rent, crack, or split in wood.

"I stevillit backe, and lowten doune, set mai nebb to aue gell in the dor."—Hogg: Winter Tales, ii. 41.

gell (3), gill, s. [GILL (1), s.]

Bot.: A labiate plant, Nepeta glechoma.

gel-loch, s. [GELL (3), v.] A shrill cry, a yell.

"We'll never mair scare at the pooly-wooly of the whaup nor swirl at the gelloch of the ern."—Brownie of Bodsbeck, i. 288.

gel-lock, s. [A corrupt. of gavelock (q. v.).] An iron cross-bar.

gēl-lŷ, s. & a. [JELLY.]

A. As subst.: Jelly.

B. As adj.: Clotted.

"They softly wipt away the gelly blood."

Spenser: F. Q., III. iv. 40.

gē-lōs-cō-pŷ, s. [Gr. gelōs=laughter, and skopē=to see.]

Antiq.: An old kind of divination by the laughter of any person; the inferring or discovering the qualities, &c., of any person by the nature of his laughter.

gēl-sē-mine, s. [Eng., &c., gelsemium, and suff. -ine (Chem.) (q. v.).]

Chem.: An alkaloid, $C_{22}H_{38}N_2O_4$, occurring in the root of Gelsemium sempervirens. It is an amorphous transparent mass, slightly soluble in water, soluble in alcohol and in ether. It tastes bitter and is poisonous; when it is dissolved in sulphuric acid, and potassium dichromate is added, the solution turns a cherry-red color, then violet, and then green.

gēl-sē-mī-ūm, s. [Ital. gelsomino=jasmine.]

1. Bot.: A genus of Loganiaceae, or, in the opinion of some, of Bignoniaceae. Gelsemium nitidum, or sempervirens, a climbing shrub with fragrant yellow flowers, is the Carolina Jessamine. It has been introduced into greenhouses.

2. Phar.: Tincture of gelsemium root is used as a sedative; in overdoses it causes death by paralysis of the respiratory muscles.

gēlt, pa. par. [GELD, v.]

gēlt, *geld, *gelde, *gild, *yeld, a. & s. [Icel. geldr; O. Sw. galder; Sw. gall; Dan. gold.] [GELD, v.]

A. As adjective:

I. Literally:

1. Castrated, gelded.

*2. Barren, unfruitful.

II. Figuratively:

1. Emasculated; having lost the power of generation.

2. Weak, feeble, spiritless.

B. As subst.: A gelding.

"The spayed gELTS they esteem the most profitable."—Mortimer: Husbandry.

gēlt (1), s. [GILT.] Tinsel or gilt surface; or perhaps gold.

"I won her with a girdle of gelt," Emboss with bugle about the belt."

Spenser: Shepherd's Calendar; Feb.

gēm, *gemme, s. [O. Fr. gemme, from Latin gemma=a bud, a gem; Ital. gemma; Sp. yema; Port. gomo, gemma.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A precious stone, as the diamond, ruby, emerald, &c., especially when cut and polished for ornamental purposes; a jewel.

"The shining circlets of his golden hair . . .

Instarred with gems and gold, bestrow the shore."

Pope: Homer's Iliad, xvii. 65.

*2. A bud. [GEMMULE.]

"From the joints of thy prolific stem

A swelling knot is raised, called a gem."

Denham: Of Old Age, 576.

3. Anything resembling a gem in beauty or brilliancy; as a drop of dew.

4. Anything of the greatest value, beauty, or rareness.

II. Zool.: The same as GEMMULE (q. v.).

Artificial gems: Factitious stones are made of very pure, fusible, highly transparent, and dense glass, usually called paste or strass. The composition is silica, potassa, and oxide of lead, with some other ingredients at times, and metallic oxides for coloring. The beauty depends upon the clearness and the exact imitation of the natural gem, and also upon the care and skill in the cutting.

Obvious compounds are gem-adorned (Byron); gem-illumined, gem-surpassing, gem-tipt (Couper), &c.

gem-cutting, s. The surfaces of gems are cut into facets to increase their brilliancy. The greater the natural brilliancy, the fewer facets are required to obtain a given brilliancy.

gem-engraving, s. The art of engraving on gems. It is performed by small revolving wheels or points charged with diamond dust, emery, &c., according to the hardness of the gem. It is also called Gem-sculpture, or Lithoglyphics (q. v.). [CAMEO, INTAGLIO.]

gem-sculpture, s. The same as GEM-ENGRAVING (q. v.).

gēm, v. t. & i. [GEM, s.]

A. Transitive:

1. To adorn with gems, jewels, or precious stones.

2. To bespangle or adorn, as with gems.

"In the vase mysterious fling Pinks and roses gemm'd with dew."

Jones: Muse Recalled.

3. To put forth in buds.

"Rose, as in dance, the stately trees, and spread Their branches, hung with copious fruit, or gemmed
Their blossoms." Milton: P. L., vii. 325.

B. Intrans.: To put forth the first buds.

Gē-ma'-ra, s. [Aramean gemara, which according to Buxtorf is=supplement or complement, but according to Dr. Samuel Davidson is=doctrine, being derived from gemar=to learn.]

geminate-flowers, s. pl.

Bot.: Twin flowers; flowers produced in pairs.

geminate-leaves, s. pl.

Bot.: Leaves arranged in pairs; leaves springing from the same node, but not opposite to each other.

gēm-i-nāte, v. t. [Fr. gémîner; Ital. geminare; Sp. geminar.] [GEMINATE, a.] To double.

gēm-i-nā-tion, s. [Latin geminatio, from geminus, pa. par. of geminus=to double.]

1. The act of doubling; duplication.

"They admit a gemination of principal parts."—Brownie: Vulgar Errors, bk. iii., ch. xv.

2. Duplication; reduplication; an increasing two fold.

"If the evil be in the sense and in the conscience both, there is a gemination of it."—Bacon: Colors of Good and Evil, § 8.

gēm-i-nī, s. pl. [Masc. pl. of Lat. geminus=twin, produced at the same birth with another.]

Astron.: The third of the zodiacal constellations. The name is given from two conspicuous stars, Alpha and Beta Geminorum, the former named, after the example of the Greeks, Castor; the latter, Pollux. If an imaginary line be drawn through the belt of Orion and two bright stars in the line of the belt, it will nearly pass through Gemini. If again Regulus and Aldebaran be above the horizon, and the space between them be equally divided, the point of bisection will be in Gemini. Castor is a remarkable binary star of the first magnitude, Pollux is of the second. The sun enters the third sign of the zodiac which is different from the actual constellation about May 21, and passes from it to Cancer about June 21.

gēm-i-nif-lō-roūs, a. [Latin geminus=twin, double; flos (genit. floris)=a flower; Eng. adj. suff. -ous.]

Bot.: Twin-flowered; having two flowers growing together.

gēm-in-ōūs, a. [Lat. geminus=twin.] Double; in pairs; twin.

"Christians have baptized these geminous births and double constellations, with several names, as conceiving in them a distinction of souls."—Brownie: Vulgar Errors, bk. iii., ch. xv.

gēm-i-nŷ, s. [GEMINI.] A pair, a brace, a couple.

"I have grated upon my good friends for three reprieves for you, and your couch-fellow, Nim; or else you had looked through the grate, like a gemyng of baboons."—Shakesp.: Merry Wives of Windsor, ii. 2.

gēm-i-tōr-ēs, s. pl. [Latin gemitus=a sigh, a groan, from gemo=to sigh, to groan. The name is not a good one. Gemo does not mean to coo, and the cheerful love-song of the pigeons is neither a sigh nor a groan.]

Ornith.: Cooers. The same as the sub-order Columbacei (q. v.). It contains the pigeons.

gēm-mā (pl. gēm-mā), s. [Lat.=a bud, eye, or gem of a plant.]

I. Botany:

1. The name given by Linnaeus to a leaf-bud, as distinguished from the flower-bud of a plant.

2. (Pl.). Minute green bodies in the cystule or open cups which constitute the fructification of Marchantia. They occur also in some Mosses and Hepaticæ.

II. Zoöl. (pl.): The buds produced by any animal, whether detached or not.

gēm-mā-ċē-ōūs (or ceous as shūs), a. [Lat. gemma; English adj. suff. -aceous.] Pertaining to gems or leaf-buds; of the nature of or resembling gems.

gēm-mā, s. pl. [GEMMA.]

gēm-mān, s. [A vulgar contraction of gentleman (q. v.).] A gentleman. (Vulgar.)

B. As substantive:

1. A depository for gems; a jewel-house. (Blount.)

2. A knowledge of gems.

"In painting and gemmary Fortunato was a quack."—E. A. Poe: Cask of Amontillado.

gēm-māte, a. [Lat. gemma, from gemma=a gem.]

Bot.: Having buds.

gēm-māt-ēd, a. [Lat. gemma.] Adorned or set with gems or jewels.

gēm-mā-tion, s. [Lat. gemma=(1) bearing gems, (2) bearing buds, from gemma=a gem, a bud; Fr. gemination.]

1. Botany:

(1) The act of budding; specif. the production of buds in the axils of the floral leaves, the former developing into new flowers or inflorescences. This is seen occasionally in Scabiosa and Dipsacus.

(2) The manner in which young leaves are folded up in a bud before it opens; veneration.

† (3) The time when buds come forth.

2. Zoöl.: Generation by the development of buds, which in some species, as Cheroma, grows out of the forepart of the body, and in others, as Vorticella, from the hind part near the stem, or from the stem itself, from which the young animal soon detaches itself. (Owen.) Nicholson considers that the simplest form of gemmation is seen in the power possessed by a crustacean to replace a lost limb. Another form of it is when a foraminifer, consisting of a little sphere of sarcodæ, develops a second one like the first, then a third one like the second, till quite a group of these little globes has been formed, after which the whole are surrounded by a complex shell. Another kind of it is seen in the Flustra, in which a single polypide, by developing a series of buds which remain in contact with the parent stem, finally makes the complex sea mat, which the unobservant mistake for an algal. This is called continuous gemmation. When, as is the case of the fresh-water Hydra, the new beings developed from buds become disconnected from their parents, and set up a separate existence, the phenomenon is called discontinuous gemmation. Finally when the young individuals remain within the body of the parent till that parent dies, this is termed internal gemmation. It occurs in some polyzoa. (Nicholson.)

gēm-mēis, s. pl. [GEMEL.] A pair of hinges.

gēm-mē-ōūs, a. [Lat. gemma, from gemma=a gem, a bud.]

1. Pertaining to or of the nature of gems.

"Sometimes we find them in the gemma matter itself."—Woodward: On Fossils.

gēm-ō-te, s. [A. S. gemót.] A meeting; the court of a hundred. [MEET, Moot, MOTE.]

gēmš-bōk, gēmš-bōc, s. [Ger. gamsbock=the male of the chamois; gemse=chamois, and bock=buck.]

Zoöl.: An antelope, Oryx gazella, called by Pallas Antelope oryx, of a heavy stout build, about five feet long, three feet two inches high, with straight horns from two to two and a half feet long. It is of a rusty brown color, variegated with black and white. It is a fierce animal, dangerous when wounded to hunters, and at times holding even the lion at bay. It inhabits the karroos of Southern Africa. Pennant called it the Egyptian Antelope, but it is not found in the Nile valley.

"And the gembock and eland unthought recline By the skirts of grey forests o'erhung with wild vine."—Thos. Pringle: Afar in the Desert.

gēmš-horn, s. [Ger.]

Music:

1. An instrument made of the horn of the chamois goat.

2. An organ-stop, 8, 4, or 2 feet in length, the pipes of which, generally of metal, are taper-shaped, being only about one-third the size at the top that they are at the mouth, with a tone somewhat lighter than a cylindrical stop of the same scale at the mouth, and very musical. It was first introduced here by Father Smith, who placed one in the choir organ at the Temple. It passed out of sight for many years, but was reintroduced by the late Mr. William Hill. (E. J. Hopkins, in Grove's (Eng.) Dict. of Music.)

gendarme (as zhañ-darm), s. [Fr.]

1. Lit.: One of the armed police of France. They are divided into horse and foot gendarmes. They are all picked men, and are usually selected from the military forces for their courage and good character. They are divided into brigades, and a number of brigades form a departmental company.

"When the Peers withdrew, it seems the proofs about his design of raising the North, or the city, or of the killing the gendarmes, did not satisfy them."—Burnet: Hist. of the Reformation (an. 1551).

† The gens-d'armes were originally the king's horse-guards only, but afterward the king's gardes-du-corps, the musketeers and light-horse were reckoned among them. There was also a company of gentlemen (in number about 250) bearing this name.

2. Fig.: (See extract.)

"Pollinger and his followers were nearly brought to a standstill by one of those projecting pieces of rock which are called gendarmes: apparently from their frequently stopping travelers."—Saturday Review, Feb. 17, 1883, p. 208.

gēn-dēr (1), gen-dre, gen-er, gen-dyr, s. [Fr. genre, from Lat. genere, ablat. sing. of genus=a kind, a kin; Ital. genere=kind; Sp. & Port. genero.]
I. Ordinary Language:

*1. A kind, a sort, a class.
 "Our bodies are our gardens . . . if we will supply it with one gender of herbs, or distract it with many, the power or corrigible authority of this lies in our will."—Shakesp.: Othello, i. 3.

*2. A class or rank of people.
 "Why, to a public count I might not go.
 Is, the great love the general gender bear him."
Shakesp.: Hamlet, iv. 7.

*3. A sex.
 4. In the same sense as II.

II. Gram.: One of those classes or categories into which words are divided according to the sex, natural or figurative, of the objects which they represent; a class of words distinguished by similarity of ending, such ending marking a distinction in sex, as seen in adjectives, nouns, participles, &c.; a grammatical category in which words of a similar ending are classed together. In English, words denoting males are said to be of the masculine gender, those denoting females of the feminine gender, and those denoting things of no sex of the neuter gender. Grammatical gender is that which is marked by different terminations, as dominus (m.), domina (f.). Grammatical gender existed in Anglo-Saxon, but went out of use gradually after the Norman Conquest.

"Gender is a grammatical distinction, and applies to words only. Sex is a natural distinction, and applies to living objects."—Morris: Outlines of English Accidence, § 66.

Crabb thus discriminates between gender and sex: "Gender signifies properly a genus or kind; sex signifies the habit or nature. The gender is that distinction in words which marks the distinction of sex in things: there are, therefore, three genders, but only two sexes. By the inflections of words is denoted whether things are of this or that sex, or of no sex. The genders, therefore, are divided in grammar into masculine, feminine, and neuter; and things are divided into male and female sex." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

gēn-dēr (2), s. [Etym. doubtful.]
Music: A Javanese musical instrument. It consists of a row of parallel metallic plates supported horizontally by two strings passed through the respective nodal lines of the plates. 1. The whole; that which comprehends or includes all, or the chief part; that which is general; opposed to particular; general principles.

"To conclude from particulars to generals is a false way of arguing."—Broom.

*2. The public, the community; the general body of the people.

*3. That which is general or common to all.

"All our abilities, . . .
 Severals and generals of grace."
Shakesp.: Troilus and Cressida, i. 3.

4. In the same sense as II. 2 (1).

"The war's whole art each private soldier knows,
 And with a general's love of conquest glows."
Addison: The Campaign, 296.

*5. A leader, a chief.
 "The general of your woes."
Shakesp.: Romeo and Juliet, v. 3.

II. Technically:

1. Eccles.: The chief or head of an order, or of all the houses or congregations established under the same rule.

"After the bishops come the mitred abbots . . . with the generals of the religious orders."—Dr. H. Vaughan: Year of Preparation for Vatican Council, ch. iii.

2. Military:
 (1) One of the chief military officers of a country or government; the commander of an army or of a division or brigade; a general officer.
 (2) A general drum-call beaten in the morning, to give notice to the infantry to be ready to march.

 *3. Naut.: An admiral.
 "In general, *In the general, *For the general:

In the main; generally speaking; as a rule; for the most part.

"The cloth, in general, will resist water for some time; but that which has the strongest glaze will resist longest."—Cook: Third Voyage, bk. ii., ch. xi.

General* is commonly affixed to words expressive of rank or office, with the force of highest or senior; as, Adjutant-General, Attorney-General, Postmaster-General, &c.

Law: A person authorized by his principal to sign all contracts, execute all deeds, and act in every way as his agent.

Music: Thorough bass.

Ch. Hist.: [COUNCIL, CECUMENICAL.]

general-court, s. A court of legislature.

general-dealer, s. One who deals in all the articles of daily use, instead of confining himself to one particular branch of trade.

Law: An issue which traverses and denies at once the whole declaration, without offering any special matter whereby to evade it.

"As in trespass, non culpabilis, not guilty; in debt upon contract, nonquam, indebitatus, that he never was indebted; in debt on bond, non est factum, it is not his deed; on an assumpsit, non assumpsit, he made no such promise; or in an action on a warranty, that he did not warrant, or on an agreement, that he did not agree. These pleas are called the general issue, because, by importing an absolute and general denial of what is alleged in the declaration, they amount at once to an issue: by which we mean a fact affirmed on one side and denied on the other."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. iii., ch. 11.

Law: The right to detain a chattel, &c., until payment be made not only for the particular article, but of any balance that may be due on a general account in the same line of business.

Mil.: The staff of an army. [STAFF.]

Eng. Law: An estate-tail where one parent only is specified whence the issue must be derived.

bōl, bōy; pōut, jōw1; cat, cell, chorus, qhīn, bench; go, gem; thīn, thīs; sin, ag; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f.
 -cian, -tian = shān. -tion, -sion = shūn; -tīon, -sīon = zhūn. -tious, -cious = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl.

Logic: A term which is the sign of a general conception or notion.

¶ General term of a series: That term from which any term whatever may be deduced, by assigning proper values to the arbitrary constants which enter it.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between general and universal: "The general is to the universal what the part is to the whole. What is general includes the greater part or number: what is universal includes every individual or part. The general rule admits of many exceptions: the universal rule admits of none. Human government has the general good for its object: the government of Providence is directed to universal good. General is opposed to particular, and universal to individual." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

gĕn-ĕr-ă-lĕ (pl. gĕn-ĕr-ă-lĕ-s) (1), s. [Latin neut. sing. of generalis=general.]

1. That which is general.
2. The usual commons in a religious house.
3. Pl.: Generalities; general terms.

"Destined to serve as the generalia or first principles of the various arts."—J. S. Mill. (Ogilvie.)

gĕn-ĕr-ă-le (2), s. [Fr.]

Milit.: Formerly a beat of drum for the assembly of all the troops preparatory to a march or to going into action. When beaten unexpectedly it was the signal for the whole of the troops to assemble at the alarm-posts. (Voyle.)

"Hurrah, boys! the morning of battle has come, And the generale's beating on many a drum." Davis: Battle-Eve of the Brigade.

gĕn-ĕr-ă-lĕss, s. [English general; -ess.] A female general or commander.

"He hastily nominates generalesse."—Carlyle: French Revolution, pt. 1, bk. vii., § 5.

gĕn-ĕr-ă-lĭsm, s. [Eng. general; -ism.]

1. A general conclusion.
2. A platitude.

"He began with generalisms about humility."—Burton: City of the Saints, ch. v.

gĕn-ĕr-ă-lĭs-sĭ-mō, s. [Ital. & Sp.; Fr. généralissime.] A commander-in-chief; the chief commander of an army consisting of two or more grand divisions under separate generals.

"In case of any foreign invasion, the King was by law to be generalissimo, to command the people for their own safety."—Ludlow: Memoirs; King Charles' Case.

gĕn-ĕr-ă-lĭ-tĭ, gĕn-ĕr-ă-lĭ-tĭe, s. [Fr. généralité, from Lat. generalitas, from generalis=general; Sp. generalidad; Ital. generalità.]

- *1. The state of being general; the quality of including species or particulars.
2. A general statement; a statement which is not specific, but applies to a whole class taken collectively; a statement which is not confined to any one particular case.
3. The main body; the bulk; the greatest part; the majority.
- *4. Pl.: General affairs; the interests of the general public.
- *5. A district governed by a general.

gĕn-ĕr-ă-lĭz-ă-ble, a. [English generaliz(e); -able.] That may or can be generalized or reduced under a general rule, or referred to a particular class or genus.

gĕn-ĕr-ă-lĭz-ă-tĭon, gĕn-ĕr-ă-lĭz-ă-tĭon, s. [Fr. généralisation; Sp. generalización.] [GENERALIZE.]

1. The act or process of generalizing; the act of making general, or of bringing several objects agreeing in some point under a common or general name, head, or class; an extending from particulars to generals.

"This has led some philosophers to suppose that another faculty besides abstraction, to which they have given the name of generalization, is necessary to account for the formation of genera and species."—Stewart: On the Human Mind, pt. iv., § 1.

2. A general inference.

gĕn-ĕr-ă-lĭz-e, v. t. & i. [Fr. généraliser; Sp. generalizar, from Lat. generalis=general (q. v.).]

A. Transitive:

1. To reduce to or arrange in a genus; to view in relation to a genus or genera; to bring, as a particular fact or series of facts, into relation with a wider circle of facts.

"The mind, therefore, makes its utmost endeavors to generalize its ideas, begins early with such as are most familiar, comes in time to those that are less so."—Bolton: Essay on Human Knowledge, § 5.

2. To deduce or infer as a general principle from many particulars.

"A mere conclusion, generalized from a multitude of facts."—Coleridge.

B. Intrans.: To employ one's self in generalization; to generalize objects.

gĕn-ĕr-ă-lĭ, gĕn-ĕr-ă-lĭ, gĕn-ĕr-ă-lĭche, gĕn-ĕr-ă-lĭe, adv. [Eng. general; -ly.]

1. In general; without specification or exact limitation.

"Generally we would not have those who read this work of Sylvia Sylvarum, account it strange that we have set down particulars untied."—Bacon: Sylvia Sylvarum. (Pref.)

2. Collectively; in a body; not partially or severally, but universally.

"I counsel that all Israel be generally gathered unto thee."—2 Samuel xvii. 11.

3. In the main; in general; for the most or greatest part; mainly, principally.

"Look, when you will, into sessions-papers, and other accounts of bad people, who have suffered for their crimes, and you will generally find they began by neglecting the sabbath."—Giltin: Works, vol. ii., ser. 30.

4. In the main; without minute detail.

"Those who are driven into the fold are, generally speaking, rather made hypocrites than converts."—Dryden: Hind and Panther. (Pref.)

¶ For the difference between generally and commonly, see COMMONLY.

gĕn-ĕr-ă-lĭness, s. [Eng. general; -ness.]

1. The quality or state of being general; wide extent, though short of universality.

"They had, with a general consent, rather springing by the generalness of the cause than of any artificial practice, set themselves in arms."—Sidney.

2. Commonness, frequency, usualness.

gĕn-ĕr-ă-lĭ-ship, s. [Eng. general; -ship.]

1. The office or rank of a general; command as a general.

"Thus those fifteen hundred horse which marched northward, within very few days were brought to nothing, and the generalship of the Lord Digby to an end."—Clarendon: Civil War, ii. 718.

2. A title of respect addressed to a general.

"Your generalship puts me in mind of Prince Eugene when he fought the Turks at the battle of Belgrade."—Goldsmith: She Stoops to Conquer, ii.

3. The skill of a general; military skill exhibited in the management of troops and the conduct of war; strategical skill.

"Cicero laughs, in one of his letters, at his generalship."—Bolingbroke: Letters on History.

4. The discharge of the functions of a general.

5. Judicious or skillful tactics or management generally.

gĕn-ĕr-ă-lĭ-ty, s. [English general; -ty.] The whole; the totality.

"The municipal laws of this kingdom are of a vast extent, and include in their generality all those several laws which are allowed as the rule of justice and judicial proceedings."—Hale: Prim. Orig. of Mankind.

gĕn-ĕr-ănt, a. & s. [Lat. generans, pr. par. of genero=to beget, to gender (q. v.).]

A. As adjective:

*1. Ord. Lang.: Begetting, producing, generative.

"In such pretended generations the generant or active principle is supposed to be the sun, which, being an inanimate body, cannot act otherwise than by his heat."—Ray: On the Creation, pt. ii.

II. Math.: Acting as a generant (q. v.).

B. As substantive:

1. Ord. Lang.: That which generates, begets, or produces; the generative principle or power.

"Some believe the soul made by God, some by angels, and some by the generant."—Glanvill: Scepis Scientifica, ch. iii.

II. Math.: That which by its motion generates or is conceived as generating a line, figure, or solid body; thus, a circle revolving about its diameter as an axis is the generant of a sphere. [GENERATION.]

gĕn-ĕr-ăte, v. t. & i. [Lat. generatus, pa. par. of genero=to produce; genus (genit. generis)=a race, offspring.]

A. Transitive:

1. Ordinary Language:

1. To beget, to propagate, to procreate.
2. To produce or bring into life; to give existence to.
3. To cause to be; to produce. (Of material things.)
4. To cause, to produce; to give origin or rise to. (Of immaterial things.)

"Yet we ought to remember that it is the nature of injustice to generate injustice."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xvi.

II. Math.: To trace out or form as a line, figure, or solid body by the motion of a point or a magnitude of inferior order.

"If a mathematical surface be moved according to a mathematical law, the volume swept over by it, in its motion, is said to be generated by it, and is a mathematical solid or volume."—Davies & Peck: Mathem. Dictionary.

B. Intrans.: To beget, propagate, or procreate. "Those creatures which being wild generate seldom, being tame, generate often."—Bacon.

gĕn-ĕr-ă-tĭng, pr. par., a. & s. [GENERATE, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act or process of begetting, producing, or originating.

generating-function, s.

Math.: A term used by Laplace, in solving equations of differences, to denote any function of x considered with reference to the coefficients of its expansion in powers of x .

generating-line, or figure, s.

Math.: A line or figure by the motion of which a figure or solid is conceived to be generated or described.

generating-plate, s.

Elect.: The positive plate in a voltaic couple, or the plate which is dissolved, generally a plate of zinc.

generating-surface, s. The heating surface of a boiler; that on which heat is applied to generate steam.

gĕn-ĕr-ă-tĭon, gĕn-ĕr-ă-cioun, gĕn-ĕr-ă-cyon, s. [Fr. génération, from Lat. generatio, from generatus, pa. par. of genero=to generate; Sp. generación; Ital. generazione; Port. geração.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of begetting, procreating or producing. "So fertile be the floods in generation." Spenser: F. Q., IV. xii. 1.

*2. The act of producing, causing or giving rise or existence to.

"Seals make excellent impressions: and so it may be thought of sounds in their first generation."—Bacon.

*3. Progeny; offspring; issue.

"The barbarous Scythian, Or he that makes his generation messes To gorge his appetite, shall to my bosom Be as well neighbored."—Shakespeare: Lear, i. I.

4. A single succession or step in natural descent, as the children of the same parents; an age or period between one succession and another.

"Four generations of Stuarts had waged a war to the death with four generations of Puritans."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. vii.

5. The people of the same period or age; those living at the same time.

"O faithless and perverse generation, who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come?"—Luke ix. 41.

6. A family; a race.

"Thy mother's of my generation." Shakespeare: Timon of Athens, i. 1.

*7. A pedigree, lineage, or descent.

"Thus from the fact of Lot, we derive the generation of Ruth, and blessed Nativity of our Savior."—Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. v., ch. xxi.

*8. An age.

"Every where throughout all generations and ages of the Christian world, no church ever perceived the word of God to be against it."—Hooker: Eccles. Polity.

II. Technically:

1. Math.: The formation of any magnitude by the motion of a point, or a magnitude of an inferior order. Thus, if a point move in accordance with any mathematical law, the path which it traces out is said to be generated by the point, and is a mathematical line. If a mathematical line be moved in accordance with a mathematical law, the surface in which it is always found is said to be generated by the line, and is always a mathematical surface. The moving point or magnitude is called the generatrix, and the law according to which the motion takes place is called the law of generation. (Davies & Peck.)

2. Phys. Anat.: The function which has for its object the propagation of the species, generation, presents many points of resemblance in plants and animals. In the former it is cryptogamic, or phanerogamic; in the latter non-sexual or sexual. In the cryptogamic and non-sexual generation, the new individual is developed by a separation of particles from the body of the parent, by which the new formation is nourished until it has so far matured as to be capable of an independent existence. (Todd & Bowman: Phys. Anat., vol. i., introd. p. 25.)

¶ (1) Alternation of generation, alternate generation.

Biol.: [ALTERNATION.]

(2) Equivocal, or Spontaneous generation: Biol.: The view that some of the lower animals, or plants, or the primordial form of one or other, or both of the animal and vegetable kingdoms may have sprung from lifeless matter without the intervention of any previously existing parent. Alleged

instances of such equivocal generation were shown to be unfounded, but essentially the same view has been revived as an hypothesis by Hæckel and some evolutionists. It is called by Huxley abiogenesis (q. v.). For other kinds of generation, see Fissiparous, Gemmiparous, Larviparous, Oviparous, Pupiparous, and Viviparous.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between generation and age: "Those who are born at the same time constitute a generation; that period of time which comprehends the age of man is the age: there may therefore be many generations spring up in the course of an age; a fresh generation is springing up every day, which in the course of an age pass away, and are succeeded by fresh generations." (Eng. Synon.)

gên-êr-â-tive, a. [Fr. génératif, from Lat. generatus, pa. par. of genero=to generate; Sp., Port., & Ital. generativo.]

1. Having the power or property of generating, procreating, or producing; pertaining to generation or production.

"They have the seed of regeneration by the ministerie of the church, which veth to that end and purpose not only the word, but the sacraments, both having generative force and virtue."—Hooker: Eccles. Polity, bk. v., § 50.

2. Prolific; fruitful.

"If there hath been such a gradual diminution of the generative faculty upon the earth, why was there not the like decay in the production of vegetables?"—Bentley. (Todd.)

generative-tissue, s.

Bot.: The same as FORMATIVE-TISSUE (q. v.).

gên-êr-â-tôr, s. [Lat., from generatus, pa. par. of genero=to generate; Fr. générateur; Ital. generatore.]

1. Ord. Lang.: One who or that which begets, generates, produces, or propagates; a propagator or procreator.

II. Technically:

1. Aërated Water: An apparatus for generating carbonic-acid gas for charging soda-fountains, or bottles with aerated water.

2. Chem.: A term used to denote the elements or compounds from which a more complex substance is obtained. Thus ethyl, alcohol, and acetic acid are the generators of acetic ether; and benzoic acid and glycolcol are the generators of hippuric acid. By the action of acids or alkalies these substances can be resolved into their generators, and so the constitution of a complex body can be determined; thus, Lecithin, a constituent of the brain, has the formula $C_{44}H_{90}N_2P_2O_9$; it has six generators, glycerin, phosphoric acid, stearic acid, glycol, methyl alcohol, and ammonia; therefore it is found to be a distearate glycerophosphate of choline, and choline has been found to be a trimethyl oxyethyl ammonium hydrate $(CH_3)_3N^+CH_2OH^-CH_2OH^-$.

3. Distill.: A retort in which volatile hydrocarbons are distilled from liquid or solid matters.

4. Music: A ground note, fundamental bass, root, derivative. The principal sound or sounds by which others are produced, as the lower c for the treble of the harpsichord, which beside its octave will strike an attentive ear with its twelfth above or g in alt, and with its fifteenth above or c in alt.

5. Steam: A vessel in which steam is generated from water, for use in a steam-engine, a heating apparatus, &c. The term was first applied to the Perkins steam-boiler, in which water in small quantity was heated to a high temperature. It is now specifically applied to a class of instantaneous generators. The name is now rapidly coming into use for all apparatus for generating steam, being held to be more correct than the usual term. [STEAM-BOILER.]

gên-êr-â-trix, s. [Lat.]

Math.: A point, line, or figure which by its motion generates a line, figure, or solid.

gê-nêr-ic, a. [Lat. generis (genit. of genus)=a class, a kind; Eng. adj. suff. -ic; Fr. générique; Ital. & Sp. generico.]

1. Pertaining to a genus, class, or kind; comprehending the genus as distinct from the species or from another genus; as, a generic description, that is, the description of a genus; a generic difference, a difference in genus; a generic name, a denomination which comprehends all the species belonging to a particular genus, as of animals, plants, &c.; thus Felis is the generic name of animals of the cat kind, Canis of those of the dog kind, &c.

2. Very wide, comprehensive, or extensive; pertaining to large or comprehensive classes.

"This is a generic term, applicable to every sort of mental enjoyment indiscriminately."—Cogan: On the Passions, vol. ii., dis. iii., ch. i.

generic-area, s.

Bot., Zool., & Geog.: An area to which a genus is limited. When there is one spot within this area where representatives of the genus abound more than they do in other parts of it, this is called its metropolis.

gê-nêr-ic-al, a. [Latin generis (genit. of genus)=a kind; Eng. adj. suff. -ical.] The same as GENERIC (q. v.).

gê-nêr-ic-al-ly, adv. [English generical; -ly.] With regard to genus or generic characteristics.

gê-nêr-ic-al-ness, s. [Eng. generical; -ness.] The quality or state of being generical.

gê-nêr-if-i-câ-tion, s. [Latin genus (genit. generis)=a kind, a class, and facio=to make.] The act of generalizing; generalization.

gên-êr-ô-s-i-tý, s. [Fr. générosité, from Latin generositas, from generosus=of noble birth; genus (genit. generis)=race, family; Sp. generosidad; Ital. generosità.] [GENEROUS.]

*1. Illustrious; of noble descent or birth.

"Their eyes are commonly black and small, noses little, nails almost as long as their fingers, but serving to distinguish their generosity."—Harris: Voyages, vol. i., p. 465.

2. In the ethical sense: That nobility of character which was once supposed to go with nobility of descent, but which is now known not to depend on birth, but to be present in certain individuals in all ranks of society, and absent from others of the high as well as the low.

"Generosity is the part of a soul raised above the vulgar. There is in it something of what we admire in heroes, and praise with a degree of rapture."—Goldsmith: The Bee, No. 3.

3. Liberality, munificence.

gên-êr-ô-s, a. [Fr. généreux, from Lat. generosus, from genus (genit. generis)=race, family; Sp., Port., & Ital. generoso.]

*1. Of illustrious or noble birth, descent, or extraction; nobly born.

"The generous and gravest citizens Have hent the gates."

Shaksp.: Measure for Measure, iv. 6.

2. Noble, honorable, magnanimous; highminded. (Of persons.)

"All men affect to seem generous, and will say, they scorn to be base."—Barrow, vol. i., ser. 19.

3. Noble, honorable, worthy of a highminded person. (Of things.)

"And Edith lent her generous aid,

And wept, and Lorn for mercy prayed."

Scott: Lord of the Isles, ii. 25.

4. High-spirited; possessed of or showing high-breeding or blood.

5. Full of spirit or strength; strong, heating.

"The phlegm, even in this generous wine, was copious."—Boyle.

6. Full, overflowing, abundant; as, a generous table.

7. Liberal, munificent, openhanded, bountiful.

"Generous and charitable, prompt to serve."

Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. vii.

8. Characterized by or manifesting liberality or munificence; as, a generous gift or action.

¶ For the difference between generous and beneficent, see BENEFICENT.

gên-êr-ô-s-ly, adv. [Eng. generous; -ly.]

1. With nobility of mind or character; nobly, magnanimously.

"Despise money generously, and forgive your enemy bravely."—Bp. Taylor: Sermons, vol. iii., ser. 10.

2. In a generous, liberal, or munificent manner; with generosity; liberally, freely, bountifully.

"Tis better generously bestowed on those Than left the plunder of our country's foes."

Pope: Homers Iliad, xviii. 351.

gên-êr-ô-s-ness, s. [English generous; -ness.] The quality or state of being generous; generosity, nobility, highmindedness, liberality.

"Had I not been encouraged by that generousness and sweetness of disposition."—Wilkie: Mercury. (Dedic.)

gê-nê-gi-â-l, a. [Eng. genesi(s); adj. suff. -al.] Of or pertaining to generation.

gê-nê-gi-ô-l-ô-gý, s. [Gr. genesis=origin, source, and logos=a discourse.] The science or doctrines of generation.

gên-ê-sis, s. [Gr. genesis=origin, source, birth, production, generation, creation, &c., from the obsolete root of geno, superseded by gennaō=to beget, to engender, causal of gignomai=to come into being, to be born, to be produced.]

1. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of begetting, producing, or giving origin to; imagination; origin, source, beginning.

"The origin and genesis of poor Sterling's club."—Carlyle: Life of Sterling.

2. An explanation of the origin or source of anything.

3. Production.

"If the blood becomes choked with inert matter, there necessarily results a decreased genesis of motion."—Herbert Spencer: Psychol. (2d ed.), i. 5.

4. In the same sense as II. 2.

II. Technically:

1. Math.: A term formerly used, meaning the same as generation. In the genesis of figures, the moving magnitude or point is called the describent; the guiding line of the motion is called the dirigent. [GENERATION, II. 1.]

2. Script. Canon.: The first book of the Pentateuch, of the Old Testament, and of the Bible. In the Hebrew original, as well as in the Septuagint and all modern versions, it occupies this place. It is called in Hebrew bereshith, which is its initial word, correctly translated in the authorized English version, "In the beginning." The opening chapter narrates the creation by God of this earth and all worlds (i. 1-16); ch. ii. 1-3 should have been added to this chapter. Chapters ii. 4-end to xi. 9, are occupied with archaic events in the history of the human race generally. At xi. 10 a genealogy begins, designed to give the pedigree of Abram or Abraham, "the father of the faithful," divinely selected from an idolatrous race and family (Joshua xiv. 2) to found a race (the chosen Jewish one) who should be the special depositaries and defenders of true religion against other races more or less apostate or unenlightened. The remainder of the book gives the history of Abraham, and those of his immediate descendants who were special heirs of the promises made to him—viz., Isaac, Jacob, and the twelve patriarchs (Heb. xi. 9). Counting only from the creation of Adam to the last event in Genesis (the death of Joseph), the space of time is vast; but as the Hebrew, the Septuagint, and the Samaritan Pentateuchs all differ as to certain numbers, the exact amount cannot be stated.

The Jewish and, following it, the early Christian Church almost unanimously pronounced Moses the author of the work, deriving his knowledge of the events prior to his time either from direct revelation or from prior documents consulted under Divine guidance. In A. D. 1753 Astruc, an eminent French medical professor, attempted to point out two such documents, distinguishable by the fact that in one the Divine Being is called almost always Elohim, while in the other he is named Jehovah. On the revival of this hypothesis in the present century, Hengstenberg and others contended against it, maintaining that in every case there was a reason why the Divine name which we find in the particular verse was chosen. Most critical scholars adhere to the opinion of Astruc, and perpetually speak of the Elohist—i. e., the writer who habitually calls God Elohim (q. v.)—and the Jehovist, who designates him Jehovah (q. v.). Hupfield and Boehmer assign the composition of Genesis to five writers: the Elohist, the second Elohist, the Jehovists, and the Later Editor or Compiler. Colenso reduces the five to four, making the second Elohist and the first Jehovist the same person, writing at different periods of his life. The bishop gives the following as probable dates of the several writers. In Genesis, who, he thinks, possibly were the prophets whose names are appended:

The first Elohist b. c. 1100 to 1060	Samuel.
The second Elohist and first Jehovist } 1060 to 1010	Nathan.
The second Jehovist	1035 Gad.
The Deuteronomist	641 to 624 Jeremiah.

There are many expressions common to the first Elohist and Ezekiel.

Omitting fragments of verses the following are the portions of Genesis attributed to the first Elohist, and they form a continuous narrative:

Chapters i. ii. 1-3; v. vi. 9-14, 17-22; vii. 6, 9, 11, 13-16, 18, 19, 21-24; viii. 1-5, 13-19; ix. 1-17, 28, 29; xi. 10-26, 31, 32; xii. 4-6, 12; xiii. 6, 12; xvi. 1, 3, 15, 16; xvii. 1-27; xix. 29; xxi. 2-5; xxii. 1-20; xxv. 7-17, 19-21, 24-26; xxvi. 34, 35; xxviii. 1-9; xxix. 24, 29, 32-34; xxx. 1, 4, 13, 17-24; xxxi. 18; xxxv. 9-16, 19, 20, 22-29; xxxvi. 1-19, 31-40; xxxvii. 1, 2, 28, 36; xli. 6-27; xlvii. 7-11, 27, 28; xlviii. 3-7; xlix. 1, 29.

The second Jehovist is believed to have written little but chapter xiv.

The Deuteronomist is credited with:

Chapters vi. 4; x. 8-12; xv. 1-21; xviii. 18, 19; xxi. 14-18; xxiv. 59, 60; xxvi. 4, 5; xxxv. 8.

The rest of the book is attributed to the first Jehovist. The bishop believed the work unhistorical, though in no respect fraudulent. But the immense majority of Christians in this and other countries firmly hold that this old and venerable book was composed by Moses under the guidance of Divine inspiration, and that it is in every part of unimpeachable authority.

3. Biol.: The word is often used as the second element of a compound, as abiogenesis, biogenesis, homogenesis, heterogenesis, xenogenesis, &c. (q. v.)

Gē-nēth-lī-va (2), s. [See def.]

Geog.: The name of the chief town of Switzerland.

Geneva Bible, s. A Bible or translation of the Bible into English, made and published at Geneva, chiefly by English Protestant refugees. It was the first English Bible which adopted the Roman instead of the obsolescent black type, and the first which recognized the division into verses; it was the first also which omitted the Apocrypha. From its stating, in Gen. iii. 7, that our first parents made themselves "breeches," it is sometimes called the Breeches Bible. That rendering, however, had occurred previously in Wycliffe's translation.

Geneva Convention, s.

Milit.: A Convention promoted by Mr. Henry Durrant, and signed by the great European continental powers in August, 1864, Great Britain, Greece, and Norway joining it in the following year. The chief provisions are:

1. The neutrality of ambulances and military hospitals.
2. The personnel of such ambulances and hospitals, including sanitary officers and naval and military chaplains, to be benefited by the neutrality.

3. The inhabitants of a country, rendering help to the sick and wounded, are to be respected and free from capture.

4. No distinction to be made between the sick and wounded, on account of nationality.

5. A flag and uniform to be adopted, and an armlet for the personnel of ambulances and hospitals. The flag and armlet to consist of a red Greek cross on a white ground. The Turks use a red crescent in place of the cross.

To carry out the terms of this convention, the International Society for the Aid of the Sick and Wounded has been organized, with committees in the chief towns in the United States and in Europe. It first played an important part in the Franco-German war, every nation sending its contingent of ambulances, surgeons, &c.

Geneva-cross, s.

Milit.: A red Greek cross on a white ground. [GENEVA CONVENTION.]

Geneva-gown, s.

Eccles. & Ch. Hist.: The ordinary preaching gown worn by Presbyterian ministers and by Low Church clergymen in England. It is of black silk, and in shape resembles the gown of a Cambridge [England] D. D. It was adopted by the followers of Calvin, and by the reformers who took refuge in Geneva, as a protest against the use of the alb, which is essentially a sacrificial vestment. [ALB, SURPLICE.]

Geneva-watch, s.

Horol.: Properly a kind of watch manufactured at Geneva, or of Swiss make; but also applied to any watch of similar construction. These watches have neither fuse nor chain, and are of inferior workmanship to the American lever watch. [WATCH.]

It yields a yellow dye. Ray says that the milk of cows feeding upon it is rendered bitter, and that this bitterness is retained in butter and cheese made from the milk. G. pilosa, also unarmed, is rare and local, while G. anglica, a spinous plant, is common.

gē-nis-tē-ē, s. pl. [Lat. genist(a), and fem. pl. adj. suff. -ae.]

Bot.: A sub-tribe of papilionaceous plants, tribe Lotaeae. It consists of shrubs with entire leaflets, and the stamens all united, instead of being diadelphous.

gēn-i-tāl, *gen-i-tāl, a. & s. [O. Fr. genital, from Lat. genitalis=generative, from genitum, sup. of gigno=to beget.]

A. As adj.: Pertaining to generation or procreation; generative.

B. As subst. (pl.): Those parts of an animal which are the immediate instruments of generation; the privates, the sexual organs.

gēn-i-tiāg, *gīn-nit-lāg, jēn-nēt-lāg, jūn-ēat-lāg, s. [O. Fr. jeannet; Fr. jeannot, a dimin. of jean=John, from their being ripe by St. John's Day, June 24th; cf. John-apple; or Eng. June, and eating. (Mahn, &c.)] A variety of apple which ripens early.

gēn-i-tī-val, a. [Lat. genitivus.] [GENITIVE.] Gram.: Pertaining or relating to the genitive case.

gēn-i-tive, a. & s. [Fr. génitif=the genitive case, from Lat. genitivus=of or pertaining to generation, from genitum, sup. of gigno=to beget; Sp. & Ital. genitivo. The Latin genitivus casus=the genitive case, was a mistranslation of the Greek genikē ptōsis, which properly should have been translated casus generalis=the general case, or that case which denotes the genus or kind. (See extract from Max Müller under B.)]

A. As adjective:

Gram.: A term applied to that case of nouns, adjectives, pronouns, &c., which pertains to or indicates origin, source, possession, or the like, or to the relation expressed by such a case. In English it is called possessive.

B. As subst.: That case in the declension of nouns, adjectives, pronouns, &c., which denotes or indicates origin, source, possession, or the like. In English it is called the possessive case, and is the only case which retains a case ending.

"The Latin genitivus is a mere blunder, for the Greek word genikē could never mean genitivus. Genitivus, if it is meant to express the case of origin or birth, would in Greek have been called genētikē, not genikē. . . . Genikē, in Greek, had a much wider, a much more philosophical meaning. It means casus generalis, the general case, or rather the case which expresses the genus or kind. This is the real power of the genitive. . . . The termination of the genitive is, in most cases, identical with those derivative suffixes by which substantives are changed into adjectives."—Max Müller: Lectures on the Science of Language.

gēn-i-tō, pref. [Lat. genitus, pa. par. of gigno=to beget.] Pertaining to generating, as the genitor-urinary muscles.

gēn-i-tor, s. [Lat., from genitus, pa. par. of gigno=to beget.]

1. One who begets; a father, a sire, a progenitor.
2. One who originates.
3. (Pl.): The genitals.

1. Procreation, birth, generation.
2. The power of procreation.
3. (Pl.): The genitals.

gē-ni-ūs, s. [Lat.=a tutelary spirit of a person, inclination, wit, talent; Sp. & Ital. genio; Fr. génie.]

1. A tutelary deity, whose province it was to take care of every one from the time of his birth; the ruling or protecting power of men, places, or things.

"The genius and the mortal instruments Are then in council."

Shakesp.: Julius Caesar, ii. 1.

2. The natural bent, disposition, or inclination of the mind; a particular natural talent or aptitude of mind fitting a man in an especial degree for some particular study, pursuit, or course of life; a peculiar natural structure of mind qualifying the possessor for a particular employment.

3. That natural power or faculty or combination of faculties of the mind which bears or brings forth, produces, discovers, or invents; intellectual endowment of the highest kind; superior power of invention or origination of any kind, or of producing original combinations; talent.

4. A person endowed with uncommon intellectual powers; a man of superior intellectual faculties.

"That age had produced no more inventive genius and no more daring spirit."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. vii.

5. The distinguishing disposition, bent, character, or tendency; as of a nation, a religion, a language, and the like.

¶ (1) Crabb thus discriminates between genius, ability, talent, capacity, cleverness, and wisdom: "Genius implies high and peculiar gifts of nature, impelling the mind to certain favorite kinds of mental effort, and producing new combinations of ideas, imagery, &c. Talent supposes general strength of intellect, with a peculiar aptitude for being molded and directed to specific employments, and valuable ends and purposes. Genius is connected more or less with the exercise of imagination, and reaches its ends by a kind of intuitive power. Talent depends more on high mental training, perfect command of all the faculties, memory, judgment, sagacity, &c. Hence we speak of a genius for poetry, painting, &c., and a talent for business or diplomacy. Among English orators Lord Chatham was distinguished for his genius; William Pitt for his preëminent talents, and especially his unrivaled talent for reply. Genius is the power of new combinations, wisdom the habitual employment of a patient and comprehensive understanding in combining various and remote means to promote the happiness of mankind. Abilities may be exerted in conduct, or in the arts and sciences, but rather in the former. Talents are the power of executing well a conception either original or adopted. Capacity is a power of acquiring. Cleverness designates mental dexterity and quickness." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

(2) For the difference between genius and intellect, see INTELECT; for that between genius and taste, see TASTE.

genius-chamber, *genyus-chalmer, s. The bridal chamber.

genius-loci, s. [Lat.] The presiding or tutelary deity of a place; hence, the pervading spirit of a place or institution.

Arch.: Elaborate carving in open work; the cusps or featherings in the arch of a doorway.

Gēn-ō-ēge, a. & s. [Lat. Genoensis.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to Genoa, a town in the northwest of Italy.

B. As subst.: A native or inhabitant of Genoa; the people of Genoa.

genouillieres (as zhōl-yār), *gen-yllere, s. pl. [Fr., from Lat. genu=the knee.]

1. Arm. Metal caps for covering the knees of an armed man. They first appeared in the thirteenth century as small circular metal plates, when chain Genouillieres.

A. Plain Knee-boss or Knee-piece (1325). B. From the monument of the Black Prince in Canterbury Cathedral. (In this case the armor of complete plate has been attained, and here the genouillieres have articulations above and below.) C. From monumental brass of Thos. Cheyne, Esq. (1368), at Drayton Beauchamp, Bucks. D. From the tomb of Hartmann von Kronsberg (1379), at Kronsberg. E. From statue of a knight of the De Sully family, in the church of Newton Sulney, Derbyshire. (Here the material of the cuirass passes beneath the boss, terminating in an escallop.) armor covered the leg, and led by degrees to the adoption of greaves and shin-pieces, and ultimately to entire plate armor. They were sometimes decorated with incised and gilt ornaments, and, in the fifteenth century, took a variety of fanciful forms.

2. Fortification:

(1) A part of the interior slope of the parapet below the sill of an embrasure. It covered the lower part of a gun-carriage.

(2) The height of the parapet above the banquette in a barbet battery.

genre (as zhan-re), s. [Fr., from Lat. genus (genit. generis)=a class, a kind.]

Art.: A term applied to pictures of life and manners, which, for want of a definite character, are classed together as of a certain genre or kind. Under this title are comprised the grave episodes of life, which are to history what a single scene is to a drama, or a lyric to an epic poem. Also comic pictures of all kinds. . . . The principal genre pictures consist of scenes of every-day life, and may be classified. In taking for its subject the events of daily life, genre-painting avoids religious themes as high and lasting, as well as historical subjects, which, though transitory, ought never to appear so. All the passing events of life, its characters and aims, offer fitting subject for genre-painting. (Fairholt.)

gēng (pl. gēn-tēg), s. [Lat.]

Rom. Antiq.: A class or house, the individuals composing which were termed in reference to each other, gentiles. Each gens was made up of a certain number of branches or families (familie), and each familia was composed of individual members. Several gentes made up the curie and tribes. The members of each gens bore a common name, as the Fabian gens, the Julian gens, &c., and were united by certain common religious rites.

gens-dar-mer-y, s. [GENDARMERY.]

gēnt, a. [O. Fr.; O. Sp. gento; O. Ital. gente, from Lat. genitus, applied to one of noble birth.] [GENEROUS.] Elegant, neat, handsome, comely, pretty, gentle.

gēnt, s. [An abridged form of gentleman (q. v.).] A gentleman. (Vulgar.)

gēn-tēel, a. [The same word as gentle, the ee representing the sound of the O. Fr. i in gentil.] [GENTLE, a.]

1. Graceful or elegant in mien, appearance, form, or dress.

"I perched at will on every spray,
My form gentel, my plumage gay,
My strains for ever new."

Cooper: On a Goldfinch.

2. Polite, elegant in manners, well-bred, courteous, refined; having the manners of a well-bred person; free from vulgarity.

"A set of gentel good-natured youths fallen into such a manner of life would form almost an academy."—Steele: Spectator, No. 230.

3. Free from vulgarity or buffoonery; treating of the habits, manners, or doings of good society.

"Their poets have no notion of gentel comedy."—Adair: On Italy.

4. Sufficient to maintain a person in a respectable and comfortable manner; furnishing a competence.

"Painting portraits and pictures in a gentel style of his own."—Walpole: Anecdotes of Painting, vol. iv., ch. iii.

*5. Neat, elegant.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between gentel and polite: "Gentility respects ranks in life; politeness the refinement of the mind and outward behavior. A gentel education is suited to the station of a gentleman; a polite education fits for polished society and conversation, and raises the individual among his equals. There may be gentility without politeness, and vice versa. A person may have gentel manners, a gentel carriage, a gentel mode of living as far as respects his general relation with society; but a polite behavior and a polite address, which qualify him for every relation in society, and enable him to shine in connection with all orders of men, is independent of either birth or wealth; it is in part a gift of nature, although it is to be acquired by art." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) gēn-tēel-ish, adj. [Eng. gentel; -ish.] Somewhat gentel.

gēn-tēel-ize, v. t. [Eng. gentel; -ize.] To make gentel, to gentelize.

gēn-tēel-lŷ, *gen-teel-y, adv. [English gentel; -ly.]

"He answered modestly and gentely."—Walpole: Anecdotes of Painting, vol. iii., ch. iv. (Note.)

2. With grace, elegance, or neatness.

"[He] treated her gentely, so that, dressed,
She looked extremely well where'er she went."

Byron: Beppo, 23.

3. In a respectable manner; like people of fashion.

"Their customers are gone abroad to live gentely at Lisle or Brussels."—V. Knox: Winter Evenings, Evn. 9.

gēn-tēel-nēss, s. [Eng. gentel; -ness.]

1. The quality or state of being gentel; elegance, grace; good-breeding; gentility.

"Next to him [Correggio] Parmegiano has dignified the gentleness of modern effeminacy, by uniting it with the simplicity of the ancients and the grandeur and severity of Michael Angelo."—Sir J. Reynolds: Discourse 4.

2. The qualities befitting a man of birth or rank.

gēnth-ite, s. [Named after Genth, who, in 1851, described it under the name of Nickelgymnrite.]

Min.: An amorphous mineral, containing serpentine. It is opaque to translucent, is of a pale apple green or yellow color, and has a greenish-white streak. Composition: Silica, 33.6 to 35.4; protoxide of nickel, 30.4 to 30.6; protoxide of iron, 0.2 to 2.2; magnesia, 0.2 to 4.1; lime, 0.3 to 4.1; and water, 17.1 to 19.1. It occurs near Lake Superior, and in Spain. Rottsite (q. v.) may be a variety. (Dana.)

gēn'-tian (tian as shŷ-an), s. [Latin gentiana (q. v.); Fr. gentiane.]

1. Bot.: The English name of the genus Gentiana (q. v.). Numerous species exist almost all over the world, the best known being the Marsh Gentian (Gentiana pneumonanthe), the Spring Gentian (G. verna), the Small Alpine Gentian (G. nivalis), the Small-flowered Gentian (G. amarella), the Field Gentian (G. campestris), and the American Fringed Gentians (G. crinata and G. donsona). G. lutea grows in Switzerland and the mountainous parts of Germany.

"See how the giant spires of yellow bloom
Of the sun-loving gentian, in the heat
Are shining on these naked slopes like flame."
Matthew Arnold: Empedocles on Etna, l. 2.

2. Phar.: Gentiane radix (Gentian Root), the dried root of Gentiana lutea. The root occurs in lengthened cylindrical pieces, from half an inch to one inch in diameter, and several inches long, wrinkled longitudinally, and often twisted; brown externally, yellow, tough, and spongy within; it has a sweet smell and a sweet and bitter taste. It is used to prepare Extractum gentiane (Extract of Gentian), Infusum gentiane compositum, Mistura gentiane (Gentian Mixture), and Tinctura gentiane composita (Compound Tincture of Gentian). Gentian is a bitter stomachic tonic, which improves the appetite and gives tone to the stomach.

Chem.: A peculiar bitter separated from the aqueous solution of the root Gentiana lutea by animal charcoal, and extracted therefrom by hot alcohol. It is yellow, uncrystallizable, and reduces an alkaline cupric solution. (Watts: Dict. Chem.) gentian-root, s.

Pharm.: [GENTIAN, 2, Pharm.]

gentian-spirit, s. An alcoholic liquor much drunk by the Swiss. It is made by the vinous fermentation of the infusion of gentian.

gēn-ti-ā-nā (or tī as shī), s. [Lat.=the herb gentian (Gentiana lutea). Named after an Illyrian king, Gentius.]

Bot.: The typical genus of the tribe Gentianeae, the order Gentianaceae, and the alliance Gentianales. It has the corolla tube sub-clavate, the anthers straight, and the stigmas two. About 150 species are known, chiefly in temperate regions. [GENTIAN.] The common gentian root of the druggists is mostly Gentiana lutea. [GENTIAN-ROOT.] G. campestris and Amarella, British species, are domestic substitutes for it in England. G. punctata, pannonica, purpurea, &c., on the European continent. G. kurroo, in the Himalaya mountains, and G. catesbaei, in the United States. G. cruciata has been used, but unsuccessfully, in hydrophobia.

gēn-ti-a-nā-ċē-æ (or tī as shī), s. pl. [Lat. gentian(a) (q. v.), and fem. pl. adj. suff. -acēa.]

Bot.: An order of Perigynous Exogens, the typical one of the alliance Gentianales (q. v.). It consists of herbs or rarely of shrubs, with opposite entire exstipulate leaves; sessile, or having their petioles united into a sheath, often three to four-ribbed. Flowers generally regular. Calyx divided, inferior, persistent. Corolla monopetalous, hypogynous, generally regular and persistent. Stamens inserted upon the corolla, all in the same line, equal in number to the segments, and alternate with them. Ovary with two carpels, one or partly two-celled, many-seeded. Style one; stigmas two, right and left of the axis. The order is close to Apocynaceae. It contains about 60 genera, and 450 known species. They are bitter and tonic. It is divided into two tribes, Gentianeae and Menyantheae (q. v.).

gēn'-tian-al (tian as shŷ-an), a. [Mod. Latin gentianalis.]

Bot.: Akin to Gentianeae or to Gentiana, as the gentianall alliance.

gēn-ti-an-ā-lēg (or tī as shī), s. pl. [Masc. and fem. pl. of Mod. Lat. gentianalis, from Latin gentiana (q. v.).]

Bot.: The Gentianall Alliance. An alliance of perigynous exogens, with dichlamydeous, monopetalous flowers, axile or parietal placentae, and a minute embryo, or with the cotyledons much smaller than the radicle, lying in a large quantity of albumen. Lindley includes under it the orders Ebenaceae, Aquifoliaceae, Apocynaceae, Loganiaceae, Diapensiaceae, Stilbaceae, Orobanchaceae, and Gentianeae.

gēn-ti-ā-nē-æ (or tī as shī), s. pl. [Latin gentian(a), and fem. pl. adj. suff. -acēa.]

Bot.: A tribe of Gentianeae. They have the corolla imbricated.

gēn-tian-ēl-lā (tian as shŷ-an), s. [Dimin. of Lat. gentiana.]

1. Ord. Lang.: A blue color.
2. Bot.: A genus of Gentianeae, not sufficiently distinct from Gentiana. Gentiana acaulis is placed in it.

gēn'-tian-in, gēn'-tian-ine (tian as shŷ-an), s. [Eng. &c., gentian; -in, -ine.]

Chem.: The same as GENTISINE (q. v.).

gēn'-tīle, gen-tīl, gen-tyl, a. & s. [Fr. gentil, from Lat. gentilis=one belonging to the same class, a gentile, from gens (genit. gentis)=a clan; Sp. & Port. gentil; Ital. gentile. Gentile is thus a doublet of genteel and gentle (q. v.).]

A. As adjective:

1. Ordinary Language:

1. Of or pertaining to any nation; national.
2. Of noble or gentle birth; of high rank; noble.
3. Gentle, meek, lowly.
4. Worthy of a gentleman; genteel.
5. In the same sense as II. 2.
6. Used by the Romans to denote any person out of their pale.

II. Technically:

1. Gram.: Denoting the clan, race, or country; as, a gentile noun.

2. Script.: Other than Jewish; ethnic. [B. II.]

"The helpless condition of the Gentile world in the state of Gentilism."—Locke: Paraph. on Romans, ch. v., § 5.

B. As substantive:

1. Ordinary Language:

1. One of the same clan or family.

"Gens in Latine betokeneth the race and surname, so the Romanes had Cornelios, Sergios, Appios, Fabios, Æmilios, Pisones, Julios, Brutos, Valerios, of which who were agnate, and therefore kept the name, were also gentiles."—Sir T. Smith: Commonwealth, bk. iii., ch. viii.

2. A person of noble or gentle birth; one of high rank.

"A partie of gentiles raised Edmond Yrenside into kyng."—Trevisa, vii. 99.

II. Scripture (pl.): All the nations of the world, excepting the Jews. In the Old Testament it is the rendering of the Hebrew word goyim=peoples, nations, the pl. of goy=a nation, a people. At first it was used as a mere ethnological word, and quite respectfully, but as the Jews became more conscious of their privileges, they employed it more and more scornfully of the nations around (Gen. x. 5; Isa. lxvi. 18; Jer. xiv. 22). In the New Testament Gentiles is the rendering of the Greek ethnē=the pl. of ethnos=a number of people living together, a nation. St. Peter, moved by a vision, was the first of the Twelve to preach to the Gentiles (Acts x.), but the Apostle of the Gentiles was St. Paul (Gal. ii. 15).

"We who are Jews by nature and not sinners of the Gentiles."—Galatians ii. 15.

gēn-tī-ēsse, gen-tīl-esce, gen-tīl-esse, s. [Fr. gentillesse, from gentil=gentle (q. v.); Sp. & Port. gentileza; Ital. gentilezza.] The character, manner, or characteristics of a person of noble or gentle birth; courtesy, good breeding.

"I'll make him dance. Will you go, gentles?"—Shakesp.: Merry Wives of Windsor, iii. 3.

2. A trained hawk.

† (1) Crabb thus discriminates between gentle and tame: "Gentleness lies rather in the natural disposition; tameness is the effect either of art or circumstance. Any unbroken horse may be gentle, but not tame; a horse that is broken-in may be gentle, but not always gentle. Animals are in general said to be gentle who show a disposition to associate with man, and conform to his will; they are said to be tame, if either by compulsion or habit they are brought to mix with human society. In the moral application gentle is always employed in the good, and tame in the bad, sense; a gentle spirit needs no control. A gentle expression is devoid of all acrimony, and serves to turn away wrath; a tame expression is devoid of all force or energy, and ill calculated to inspire the mind with any feeling whatever." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

(2) For the difference between gentle and soft, see SOFT.

gentle-hearted, a. Of a gentle, mild, or tender heart or disposition.

gēn'-u, s. [Lat.=a knee.]

Anat.: A bend; as, the genu of the corpus callosum; the genu of the optic tract.

gēn'-u-ānt, a. [Lat. genu=the knee.]

Her.: Kneeling.

gēn'-u-ānēct, v. i. [Lat. genu=the knee, and flecto=to bend.] To bend the knee, particularly in worship.

gēn'-u-ānēct-ion, gēn'-u-flex-ion (flexion as flex-shūn), s. [Fr. genuflexion, from Low Lat. genuflexio, from Lat. genu=the knee, and flexio=a bending; flecto=to bend; Sp. genuflexion; Ital. genuflessione.] The act of bending the knee, particularly in worship; adoration expressed by bending the knee.

"Englishmen who had no scruple about antiphonies, and genuflexions, altars and surplices."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. i.

gēn'-u-īne, a. [Lat. genuinus=innate, inborn, genuine, from the same root as genus (q. v.); Fr. genuine; Sp. & Ital. genuino.]

1. Belonging to or coming from the true stock; real, true; not counterfeit, false, spurious, or adulterated.

"I grieved for Bonaparte with a vain
And all unthinking grief! for who aspires
To genuine greatness but from just desires,
And knowledge such as he could never gain."

Wordsworth: Sonnet, dedicated to Liberty, 1801.

2. Trustworthy; not false or double-faced; as, a genuine man. (Colloquial.)

gēn'-u-īne-lī, adv. [Eng. genuine; -ly.] In a genuine manner; without falseness, adulteration, or foreign admixture; truly, purely, fairly, legitimately.

"He had genuinely raised a question which was distasteful to some portions of the House."—London Daily Telegraph.

gēn'-u-īne-nēss, s. [Eng. genuine; -ness.] The quality or state of being genuine; freedom from falseness, adulteration, or foreign admixture; purity; naturalness.

"St. Austin reasoned well in vindicating the genuineness of the Bible."—Watson: Apology for the Bible, let. 2.

† Christian apologists: The words genuineness and authenticity have been used in different senses by different writers. For the distinction between them, see AUTHENTIC, A. II. 1.

gēn'-ū-it-ī, s. [As if from Low Lat. genuitas; cf. ingenuity.] Simplicity; sincerity.

gē-nūs (pl. gēn'-ēr-a), s. [Lat.] Birth, descent, origin; a race, a kind.

I. Ord. Lang.: A class, a kind, a species.

"Rarity and density (which are the proper differences of quantity) cannot change the common nature of quantity, their genus, which, by being so to them, must be univocally in them both."—Digby: Of Bodies, ch. xiv.

II. Technically:

1. Logic: A class of objects containing several species; a class more extensive than a species; a universal which is predicable of several things of different species.

"In the defining of words, which is nothing but declaring their signification, we make use of the genus, or next general word that comprehends it. Which is not out of necessity, but only to save the labor of enumerating several simple ideas, which the next general word or genus stands for; or, perhaps, sometimes the shame of not being able to do it."—Locke: On Human Understanding, bk. iii., ch. iii.

bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwī; cat, çell, chorus, çhīn, bençh; go, gem; thin, this; sin, aç; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f.
-cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shūn; -tīon, -gīon = zhūn. -tious, -cious, -sious = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, dēl.

2. Mus. Sort or class, especially used with reference to scales; as, the diatonic, chromatic, and enharmonic genera.

3. Science.

(1) Zool. & Bot. Classification: An assemblage of species or of sub-genera closely agreeing together in all essential characteristics, not found in any others of the sub-family or family to which they belong. It may be divided into sub-genera. Among animals, Mus is a genus containing, among other animals, both the domestic mouse and the rat, which, differing in size, &c., and being clearly distinct species, have still a community of structure obvious to all. So also among plants, the various species of the rose constitute the genus Rosa. In the Latin name of a plant or animal adopted by naturalists, the first word indicates the genus, and the second the species; as, Mus musculus, Rosa spinosissima.

(2) Other sciences: Sometimes a classification like that adopted by naturalists is used in other sciences. Thus, of skin diseases there is a genus Acne with various species, Acne simplex, A. rosacea, &c.

† (1) Subaltern genera:

Logic: Terms which are alternately genera and species, genera to the lower, and species to the higher and wider conceptions.

(2) Summum genus:

Logic: The highest genus; a genus which is not considered as a species of anything; as being.

"The widest class, with which Abstraction ceases, is called the Highest (summum) Genus, because in this hierarchy of conceptions it is not brought under any other genus as its species, but is itself the genus to each conception in the series. Thus the—Individual is neither genus nor species.
Infima Species is never a genus.
Summum Genus is never a species."

Subaltern Genus are genera to those below them, and species to those above."—Thomson: Laws of Thought, §50.

gē-ō, pref. [Gr. gēō, put for gēios=belonging to land or earth; gēō, gē=the earth.] A frequent prefix in words derived from the Greek, and referring to the earth; as, geography, geology, &c.

gē-ō-cā-lŷc'-ī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. geocalyx (genit. geocalycis); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -īdæ.] Bot.: A family of Jungermanniaceæ, sub-order Jungermannæ.

gē-ō-cā-lŷx, s. [Prefix geo-, and Latin calyx (q. v.).] Bot.: The typical genus of the family Geocalycidæ (q. v.).

gē-ō-cēn'-tric, a. [Pref. geo-, and Eng. centric (q. v.).] Astronomy:

1. As viewed from or having relation to the earth as center; as, the geocentric latitude or longitude, or what is distinguished from the heliocentric—that is, as seen from the center of the sun.

2. Having reference to the center of the earth, as distinguished from any spot on its surface.

Astronomy:

1. Of a planet: Its latitude as seen from the earth.

2. Of a place on the earth's surface: The angle included between the radius of the earth through the place and the plane of the equator. It is contradistinguished from geographical latitude, which always exceeds it slightly in amount.

geocentric-longitude, s.

Astron. (of a planet): The distance measured on the ecliptic between the geocentric place and the first point of Aries.

gē-ō-cēn'-tric-al, a. [Eng. geocentric; -al.]

Astron.: The same as GEOCENTRIC (q. v.).

gē-ō-cēn'-tric-al-lŷ, adv. [Eng. geocentrically.] In a geocentric manner.

gē-ō-cēr-ēl'-lite, s. [Pref. geo-; Lat. dimin. of cereus=wax-colored, and suff. -lite (Min.) (q. v.).] Min.: A white, brittle, and easily-pulverized mineral, containing carbon 79.24, hydrogen 13.21, and oxygen 7.55=100. Obtained from the dark-brown coal of Gesterwitz. It is called also Geoceric-acid. (Dana.)

gē-ō-cēr'-ic, a. [Pref. geo-; Lat. cera; Gr. kēros=wax, and suff. -ic.] (See etym. and compound.) geoceric-acid, s.

Min.: The same as GEOCERELLITE (q. v.).

gē-ō-cēr'-ite, s. [Prefix geo-; Lat. cera; Gr. kēros=wax, and suff. -ite (Min.) (q. v.).] Min.: A white waxy mineral, consisting of carbon 79.24, hydrogen 13.13, and oxygen 7.81, from the dark-brown coal of Gesterwitz. Akin to Geocericellite. (Dana.)

gē-ō-cō-ō-rēs, gē-ō-cō-ō-rī'-zā, gē-ō-cō-ō-rī'-zæ, s. pl. [Pref. geo-, and Gr. kōris=a bug.]

Entom.: Land-Bugs. A section, group, or tribe of insects, sub-order Heteroptera. The antennæ are always visible, and the legs are formed for running. The bed-bug is one of them. Mr. Westwood calls them Auricorizæ (Air-bugs), meaning that they breathe air, rather than Geocorizæ (Land-bugs), for some are found on the surface of water, some going far out even on the sea. There are nine sub-tribes or families: (1) Ploteræ, (2) Riparia, (3) Reduvina, (4) Membranacea, (5) Bicelluli, (6) Cœcigenia, (7) Lygœodea, (8) Coreodea, (9) Scutata (q. v.).

gē-ō-crō'-nite, s. [Gr. geocronit, pref. geo-, and Gr. krōnos=Saturn, used by the alchemists for lead.]

Min.: An orthorhombic lead-gray, or grayish-blue mineral, of metallic luster; its hardness, 2 to 3; its specific gravity, 6.4 to 6.6; its composition: Sulphur, 16.5; antimony, 16.7; lead, 66.8=100. Found in Sweden, Spain, and Tuscany. (Dana.)

gē-ō-cŷ'-clic, a. [Pref. geo-, and Eng. cyclic.]

1. Of or belonging to the revolutions of the earth.

2. Periodically encircling the earth.

geocyclic-machine, s. A machine for exhibiting the simple processes by which day and night and the seasons are produced.

gē-ō-de, s. [Fr., from Gr. gaiōdēs=earthy, from gē, gaia=the earth.]

Mineralogy and Geology:

1. A term first introduced by German mineralogists to designate a hollow nodule of any mineral substance, often lined with crystals. Thus, at Oberstein, in Saxony, hollow balls of agate were found lined with crystals of quartz or amethyst. Geodes are found more or less in all volcanic rocks; they are occasionally of large size, at other times only of small dimensions.

2. The cavity in such a natural ball.

gē-ō-dēph'-a-ga, s. pl. [Pref. geo- (q. v.), and Gr. adēphagos=gluttonous, greedy.]

Entom.: One of the two leading tribes of carnivorous beetles, comprehending those which live on land as distinguished from Hydradephaga, those inhabiting water. It contains the two families of Carabidæ and Cicindelidæ (q. v.).

gē-ō-dē'-sī-an, s. [English geodesy; -an.] One versed in geodesy.

gē-ō-dēs'-ic, gē-ō-dēs'-ic-al, a. [English geodesic (q. v.); -ic; -al.] The same as GEODETTIC (q. v.).

gē-ō-dē'-sīst, s. [Eng. geodesy; -ist.] A geodesian.

gē-ō-dē'-sŷ, s. [Gr. gēodaisia, from gē=the earth, and daio=to divide; Fr. géodésie.] That branch of applied mathematics which determines, by means of observations and measurements, the figures and areas of large portions of the earth's surface, or the general figure and dimensions of the earth; that branch of surveying in which the curvature of the earth is taken into account. This becomes necessary in all extensive operations.

gē-ō-dēt'-ic, gē-ō-dēt'-ic-al, a. [English geodetic (q. v.); -ic; -ical.] Pertaining to geodesy; carried out or determined by means of geodesy; as, a geodetic survey.

geodetic-line, s. The shortest line on the surface of an ellipsoid which can be drawn between two points. It is a characteristic property of this line that at every point of the curve, its curvature is less than that of any other curve of the surface through that point.

gē-ō-dēt'-ic-al-lŷ, adv. [Eng. geodetical; -ly.] In a geodetic manner; by means of geodesy.

gē-ō-dēt'-ics, s. [GEODETTIC.] The same as GEODESY (q. v.).

gē-ō-dif-ēr-ōus, a. [Eng. geod(e); i connective; Lat. fero=to bear, to produce, and Eng. adj. suff. -ous.] Producing geodes.

gēōf-rōŷ'-a, gēōf-fræŷ'-a, gēōf-fræŷ'-a, s. [Named after M. E. F. Geoffroy, author of a Materia Medica. He died in 1731.]

Bot.: A genus of papilionaceous plants, tribe Delbergiæ. The leaves are pinnate, the fruit in drupes instead of proper legumes. The bark of Geoffroya vermicifuga and G. spinulosa is anthelmintic. It has a disagreeable smell and a sweet, mucilaginous taste. The effects are drastic, emetic, purgative, and narcotic; in large doses it is poisonous. (Lindley.)

gē-ō-gēn'-ic, a. [GEOGENIC.]

gē-ō-glōs'-sūm, s. [Pref. geo- (q. v.), and Greek glossa=the tongue.]

Bot.: Earth tongue. A genus of ascomycetous fungi, sub-order Ellvellacei. Some are black or brown, others green or purple. They are found chiefly in Europe, on closely shaven lawns, on pastures, and sphagnum bogs. None are eatable.

gē-ō-nō'-sis, s. [GEOGNOSE.] A knowledge of the earth.

gē-ō-g'-nōst, s. [Gr. gēō, for gēios=belonging to the earth, and gnōsis=knowledge; Fr. géognoste.] One versed in geognosy; a geologist.

gē-ō-g-nōs'-tic, a. [French géognostique.] Of or pertaining to geognosy or geology; geological.

gē-ō-g-nōs'-tic-al, a. [English geognostic; -al.] The same as GEOGNOSTIC (q. v.).

gē-ō-g'-nō-sŷ, s. [Gr. gēō, from gēios=belonging to the earth, and gnōsis=knowledge, gnōskō=to know; Fr. géognosie.]

1. Gen.: A term introduced by Werner to designate the science now termed geology.

2. Spec.: A description of the structure of the earth, as distinguished from geology, limiting the latter term to theoretical speculations regarding the processes by which it has been brought into its present state. This Sir Charles Lyell considered an unnecessary refinement of language.

gē-ō-gōn'-ic, gē-ō-gōn'-ic-al, a. [English geogony (q. v.); -ic, -ical; Fr. géogonique.] Of or pertaining to geogony, or the formation of the earth.

gē-ō-g'-nŷ, s. [Gr. gēō, for gēios=belonging to the earth, and gnōc=a generation, a begetting; Fr. géogonie.] A name sometimes given to the science which investigates the origin of the earth; cosmogony.

gē-ō-g'-ra-phēr, s. [Eng. geograph(y); -er.] One who is versed in geography; one who writes a treatise on geography.

gē-ō-grāph'-ic, gē-ō-grāph'-ic-al, a. [Fr. géographique.] Of or pertaining to geography; containing a description of the physical structure and characteristics of the globe.

† Royal Geographical Society: A society for the promotion of geographical research, which originated in London in 1830, one in Paris having been founded in 1821. The abbreviation for Fellow of the Royal Geographical Society is F. R. G. S.

geographical-latitude, s. [LATITUDE.]

geographical-mile, s. [MILE.]

gē-ō-grāph'-ic-al-lŷ, adv. [Eng. geographical; -ly.] In a geographical manner; with reference to geographical facts or relations; like a geographer.

gē-ō-g'-ra-phŷ, s. [Fr. géographie, from Lat. geographia, from Gr. geographia, from gēō, for gēios=belonging to the earth, and graphia=a description; graphō=to write.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. In the same sense as II. 1.

2. A school or other book treating of the science described under II.

II. Science:

1. Definition and divisions: A delineation or description of the earth as it at present is, leaving it to geology to investigate how it came into its present condition. It may be divided into three distinct sciences, Mathematical or Astronomical, Physical, and Political Geography. Mathematical geography views the earth as a planet; it investigates its relations to the sun, the moon, and other bodies belonging to the solar system. It gives attention to the angle at which its axis is inclined to the ecliptic, the position of the arctic and antarctic circles and the tropics of Cancer and Capricorn, the parallels of latitude, and the meridians of longitude. Sir John E. W. Herschel declares that, theoretically speaking, geography is a part of astronomy, and he treats it as such. He refers specially to the first department of the science. Physical geography treats of the present distribution of sea and land, the currents of the ocean, the climates of the several continents and islands. With regard to the land, it commences by indicating the position of the mountain chains and table lands, thus fixing the positions of the great rivers, to which attention is next turned. Then the position of the alluvial plains, the deserts, &c., is pointed out; the distribution of the plants over the surface of the earth, often called botanical geography, follows next; then that of the animals; and finally that of the several races of mankind. This branch of the science approaches those of geology, hydrology, meteorology, botany, zoology, and ethnology or anthropology. Finally, there follows political geography, which treats of the present distribution of political power over the world, the position and resources of the several empires, kingdoms, republics, &c., their populations and wealth, the capitals, other large cities, and the more thinly inhabited agricultural parts. This branch of the subject approaches the confines of history, the limits of almost every state not arising from the colonization of a new region, but, in the majority of instances, having been determined by the results of former battles.

2. Hist. of Geog.: Eratosthenes, B. C. 240, was one of the earliest ancient geographers of eminence; but the greatest names in this department were Strabo—who lived during the reigns of Augustus and Tiberius—and Ptolemy, who flourished about A. D. 139. The discovery of the passage round the Cape of Good Hope and that of America in the fifteenth century, gave a great impulse to its modern advance. The first Geographical Society formed in modern times was that of Paris in 1821; the Royal Geographical Society of London followed in 1830. In this country geographical science has been carefully fostered by the government, a board being appointed to supervise all practical work and to insure uniformity of nomenclature. Under the patronage of several of the earlier presidents, there was great activity in geographical research and exploration of the vast domain which lay to the westward of the then settled portions of the country. The most notable of these early expeditions was that undertaken by authority of President Jefferson, the leaders of the enterprise being General Meriwether Lewis and General William Clark (afterward Governor of the territory of Louisiana). This attempt bore fruit in the settlement of the great Mississippi basin to the northwest, and it was supplemented a few years after by the expedition under Lieutenant (afterward General) John C. Fremont. The great apostle of the United States Coast Survey was Ferd. Rud. Hassler, who was brought to this country by President Tyler. A geographical congress was held at Paris in 1875, and at the Columbian Exposition in Chicago. Some notable geographical discoveries were discussed in the various congresses.

"I now live in the house with a child, whom his mother has so well instructed this way in geography, that he knew the limits of the four parts of the world, could readily point, being asked, to any country upon the globe, or any county in the map of England; knew all the great rivers, promontories, straits, and bays in the world, and could find the longitude and latitude of any place, before he was six years old."—Locke: On Education, § 178.

*gē-ōl'-a-trīy, s. [Gr. geō, for gēios, from gē=the earth, and latreia=worship.] The worship of the earth.

1. The science which investigates the bygone history of the earth with the view of accounting for its present condition. It inquires into the successive changes which have taken place in the organic and inorganic kingdoms of nature, seeks out the causes of these changes, and traces the influence which they have exerted in modifying the surface and the external appearance of the earth. It is the province of physical and political geography to describe what the earth now is, geology attempts to furnish the reason why.

(1) Hist. of Geology: Though it is only during the present century that geology has started up into the vigor of manhood, yet its birth took place ages ago. Isolated geological observations or hypotheses occur abundantly in ancient literature. "As for the earth, out of it cometh bread; and under it is turned up as it were fire" (Job xxviii. 5); an anticipation of the Huttonian hypothesis. Egypt, according to Herodotus, is the gift of the Nile, that is, the river brought down the silt which constitutes the fertile soil of the Delta and other parts of Lower Egypt. Though there is a mixture of erroneous hypotheses in the statements attributed to Pythagoras, in Ovid's Metamorphoses, bk. xv., other parts would have done no discredit to Sir Charles Lyell. Pythagoras himself lived, it is thought, about 580 B. C., but the views handed down by Ovid were probably those of Pythagoreans in the Augustan age rather than those of Pythagoras. The best geologist of antiquity was the geographer Strabo, who lived in the first century A. D. For the long controversy regarding the nature of fossils, and if they were organic when they were entombed, see Fossil. Modern geology began with Werner, who was a Professor in the School of Mines, at Freiberg, in Saxony, in 1775. He believed that a series of universal formations had been deposited in succession from a chaotic fluid. Basalt was supposed to have had the same origin, but to this view various continental observers were opposed. Hutton published in 1785 his Theory of the Earth, developed in a separate work in 1795. He assumed no causes but those now existing. He showed that geology and cosmogony were different. "In the economy of the world," he said, "he could find no trace of a beginning, no prospect of an end." He held basalt, granite, &c., to be of igneous origin. The Wesnerians were called Neptunists, their opponents Vulcanists. In 1798 Cuvier published his Ossements Fossiles, which gave a great impulse to paleontology. [(2).]

(2) The forces or causes in operation: After inquirers had outgrown the belief in fossils produced by the plastic power of nature or all entombed simultaneously by the Noachian deluge, the belief was entertained that there had been a series of creations and catastrophes, the latter causing the universal destruction of all preexisting species. The belief was also entertained that some external causes, say the forces producing earthquake and volcanic action, were more potent in former times than now. This Prof. Huxley calls Catastrophism, which he defines to be any form of geological speculation which, in order to account for the phenomena, supposes the operation of forces different in their nature or immeasurably different in power from those which are at present in action in the universe. Sir Roderick Murchison was of this school with many continental geologists.

The second school of geology is that called by Huxley Uniformitarianism. This looks only to causes now in operation for the explanation of geological phenomena. Of this school Hutton was the founder, though it was Sir Charles Lyell that carried it forward to triumph. He showed the enormous changes which the causes now in operation are still producing, and that nearly every phenomenon, attributed to abnormally potent causes acting suddenly and briefly, could be produced by causes not more intense than those in action now, but operating through immense periods of bygone time. In his Principles of Geology, he examines aqueous causes, the action of water acting in connection with tides, currents, &c., in seas, rivers, and lakes, also the action of ice in all its forms. Next he inquires into igneous causes, volcanoes, and earthquakes. Climate and organic life are also carefully investigated in the work.

The doctrine of the third school of geologists is called by Prof. Huxley Evolutionism; it accepts nearly the whole of Uniformitarianism, except the part referring to the development of organic life. In his later years Sir Charles Lyell became an evolutionist. [DARWINISM, EVOLUTION, &c.]

(3) Geologic time: Both the uniformitarian and the evolutionist believe that they may draw to any extent on what may be called the bank of time, which will be found "ready to discount any quantity of hypothetical paper." Sir Wm. Thomson holds that any such drafts must be limited "within some such period of time as one hundred millions of years;" and another natural philosopher considers the time at call only about sixty millions of years. Prof. Huxley believes the necessity for these limitations is not proved, though perhaps one, two, or three hundred millions of years might be enough to account for geological phenomena.

With regard to the subdivision of the time, long or short, at the geologist's command, the sedimentary strata having been laid down by water, the relative thickness of each stratum will measure the proportion of geologic time required for its deposition.

(4) Geologic strata:

The geological record is made up as follows, beginning with the five great Eozoic (dawn of life), Azoic (lifeless).

SUB-DIVISIONS.

9. Quaternary: Pleistocene; 8. Tertiary: English Crag, Upper Molasse, Rupelian and Tongrian of Belgium; 7. Cretaceous: Upper Chalk, Lower Chalk, Chalk Marl, Gault, Neocomian, Lower Greensand; 6. Jura-Trias: Wealden, Purbeck, Portland, Kimmeridge, Oxford Oolites, Lower or Bath Oolite, Lower Lias, Marlstone, Upper Lias, Kissen beds, Dachstein beds; Alpine Trias, in part; Keuper, Muschelkalk, Bunter Sandstein; 5. Carboniferous: Magnesian Limestone, Lower Red Sandstone, or Rothliegendes, Upper Coal Measures, Lower Coal Measures, Millstone Grit, Lower Carboniferous, Mountain Limestone; 4. Devonian: Old Red Sandstone—Catskill Red Sandstone, Chemung, Portage, Genesee Slate, Hamilton beds, Marcellus Shale, Upper Helderberg, Schoharie, Grit, Oriskany Sandstone; 3. Upper Silurian: Lower Helderberg, Onondaga Salt Group, Salina beds, Water Lime, Niagara Group, Wenlock Group, Clinton Group, Medina Sandstone (Upper Llandovery); 2. Lower Silurian: Hudson River beds, Cincinnati Group, Lower Llandovery, Utica Shales, Trenton Limestone, Caradoc and Baln Limestone, Black River Limestone, Chazy Limestone, Calciferous Sandrock, Magnesian Limestone, Lower, Middle and Upper Cambrian; 1. Archæan: Laurentian, Huronian.

(5) Other rocks: For these, see IGNEOUS ROCKS, VOLCANIC ROCKS.

(6) Fossils: For these, see FOSSILS; see also PALÆONTOLOGY.

(7) Applied geology: Geology applied to industrial or other practical purposes; as, for instance, to mining, drainage, railway tunneling, &c.

*gē-ō-mān'-cēr, s. [GEOANCY.] A diviner or fortune-teller by means of geomancy.

*gē-ō-mān'-cŷ, *gē-o-man'-cie, *gē-o-man'-cye, *gē-o-mān'-ce, s. [Fr. géomance, géomancie, from Gr. geō, for gēios=belonging to the earth, and manteia=prophecy, divination; Sp. & Port. geomancia.] A kind of divination by means of lines formed by little dots or points, originally on the earth, and subsequently on paper, &c.

*gē-ō-mān'-tic, *gē-ō-mān'-tick, *gē-ō-mān'-tic-al, a. [Fr. géomantique.] Of or pertaining to geomancy.

*gē-ō-mān'-tic-al-īy, adv. [Eng. geomantical (-ly).] In a geomantic manner; by means of geomancy.

*gē-ō-mān'-tŷ, s. [GEOANCY.]

*gē-ōm'-ē-tēr, s. [Fr. géomètre, from Gr. gēométrēs: gē=the earth, and metrō=to measure.]

I. Ord. Lang.: One versed in geometry; a geometerician.

*II. Entom.: The name sometimes given to moths of the group Geometrina (q. v.).

*gē-ōm'-ē-tral, a. [Fr. géometral.] Pertaining to geometry; geometrical.

*gē-ō-mēt'-ric, *gē-ō-mēt'-ric-al, a. [Fr. géométrique, from Gr. gēométrikos.] [GEOMETRY.]

1. Of or pertaining to geometry; according to the rules or principles of geometry; done or determined by geometry.

2. Prescribed or laid down by geometry.

3. Disposed in geometric figures.

geometric-chuck, s. A chuck having a radial slider to which the work is attached, the slider oscillating in a plane at right angles to the axis of motion, so as to produce curved lines in various patterns, as regulated by special devices.

geometrical-construction, s. The operation of drawing a figure, by means of right lines and circles. The geometrical construction of an algebraic expression consists in drawing a figure such that each of its parts shall have its representative in the expression, and that the relation between them shall be the same as that between their representatives in the given expression. (Davies & Peck.)

geometrical-curve, s. The same as an ALGEBRAIC-CURVE (q. v.).

Arch.: A term applied to the earlier period of decorated architecture in England, in which the tracery and other ornamentation consisted of geometrical forms. [DECORATED.]

geometrical-drawing, s. Drawing with instruments, as opposed to freehand drawing.

geometrical-elevation, s.

Arch.: A design for the front or side of a building, drawn according to the rules of geometry, as distinguished from a perspective or natural elevation.

geometrical-lathe, s. A species of lathe used for making complicated patterns of interlacing lines to form an additional guard against the counterfeiting of bank-notes, &c. It is adapted for more delicate and minute work than the cycloidal engine.

bōil, bōy; pōūt, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, -cian, -tian = shān. -tion, -sion = shūn;

chīn, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -tion, -sion = zhūn. -tious, -cious, -sious = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del.

geometrical-locus, s. The curve or surface in which a point or line is always found moving, in accordance with an algebraic law. [LOCUS.]

geometrical-pace, s. A measure of five feet.

geometrical-pen, s. An instrument for drawing geometrical curves, in which the movements of a pen or pencil attached to a revolving arm of adjustable length are varied by changing the toothed wheels which give motion to the arm.

geometrical-plane, s. The same as GROUND-PLANE (q. v.).

geometrical-progression, s. A progression or series in which the terms increase or decrease by a common ratio or proportion, as, 1, 3, 9, 27, 81; 144, 36, 9, $\frac{1}{3}$, $\frac{1}{9}$, &c. [PROGRESSION.]

geometric-radius, s.

Geor.: The radius of the pitch circle of a cog-wheel. The real radius is that touching the crests of the teeth.

geometrical-solution, s. A solution of a problem effected geometrically: that is, by the aid of the right line and circle. This rejects all solutions made by aid of the higher curves, or by approximation.

geometric-square, s. An instrument for measuring distances and heights, and useful for its portability as well as for the facility, by the common rule of three, of solving most of the problems arising from its use. It is made of brass or wood, twelve or eighteen inches square, and the quadrant is graduated in each direction. The two sides opposite to the axial point of the alidade are graduated to 100 equal parts, with major divisions of ten of said parts. The 100 point finishes at the angle obliquely opposite the center from which the arc is struck. One side represents the horizon, and the alidade with two sights is equal in length to the diagonal of the square. The alidade has divisions equal to those on the sides of the square.

Building: A flight of stone stairs where the steps are secured into the wall at one end only, the other forming a continued string with an open newel.

gě-ō-mět-rī-cal-ly, *gě-ō-mět-rī-cal-lie, adv. [Eng. geometrical; -ly.] In a geometrical manner; according to the rules or laws of geometry.

gě-ōm-ě-trī-cian, s. [Eng. geometric; -ian.] One versed in geometry; a geometer; a mathematician.

gě-ō-mět-rī-dě, s. pl. [Lat. geometr(a); Gr. gēōmetrēs=a land measurer, a geometer; Latin fem. plur. adj. suff. -idē.]

Essex Emerald,
A typical specimen of the Geometrina.

Entom.: The typical family of the group or tribe of moths called Geometrina (q. v.). The antennae of the male are often pectinated, and the abdomen sometimes crested; the wings, green, generally entire rounded or angular; the larvæ rather elongate, stiff, often rough; the head generally bifid.

gě-ō-mět-rī-na, s. pl. [Latin geometr(a) and neut. pl. adj. suff. -nā.] [GEOMETRIDÆ.]

Entom.: A group or tribe of moths. The antennae are setaceous, frequently ciliated or pectinated; they are longer than the thorax. The body is generally slender; the wings broad, the posterior pair generally brightly colored and exposed to view when the animal is at rest. The larvæ have, as a rule, only ten legs; hence they have to form a loop when they walk. The group contains seventeen families:

(1) Ourapterygidæ, (2) Ennomidæ, (3) Amphidasidæ (4) Boarmidæ, (5) Boletobidæ, (6) Geometridæ, (7) Ephyridæ, (8) Acalidæ, (9) Caberidæ, (10) Macaridæ, (11) Fidonidæ, (12) Zerenidæ, (13) Ligidæ, (14) Hybernidæ, (15) Larentidæ, (16) Enbolidæ, (17) Sionidæ. (Stainton.)

gě-ōm-ě-trīze, v. t. [Eng. geometr(y); -ize.] To act according to the rules or laws of geometry; to proceed geometrically; to recognize or apprehend geometrical quantities or laws.

"Nature geometrized, and observeth order in all things."—Browne: Cyrus's Garden, ch. iii.

gě-ōm-ě-trī, *gě-ōm-ě-trīe, s. [Fr. gěométrie, from Lat. geometria, from Gr. gēōmetria=the measurement of land; gēō, for gēōs=belonging to the earth, and metria=measurement; metrēō=to measure; metron=a measure.] Properly the measurement of the earth or of land, but now used exclusively of the abstract science to which practical land measurement gave or may have given birth. It is the science of space, whether linear, superficial, or solid.

1. Hist. of Geometry: Who first invented or cultivated geometry is uncertain. The Hindoos have a geometry apparently of indigenous growth. Some knowledge of geometry was apparently possessed by the builders of the Egyptian pyramids. Diodorus and others attribute the invention or discovery of geometry to Egypt, which is doubtful. The Greeks surpassed all ancient nations in their attainments in the science. Euclid founded a school of mathematics at Alexandria some time in the reign of Ptolemy Lagus, B. C. 323 to 284. His Elements are still in use in many schools and colleges. [MATHEMATICS.]

2. Nature of the Science: Geometry, like mathematics, is built up on rigorous demonstration. To prevent the possibility of error in reasoning it is needful to commence with definitions of the terms employed. Then follow in Euclid's Elements postulates or concessions demanded as to what is possible to be done; then axioms, simple mathematical statements worthy of being believed. A popular belief is that the whole science of geometry rests upon the axioms; it is really, however, based on the definitions; thus the whole third book of Euclid follows naturally from the definition of a circle.

¶ (1) Analytical Geometry: The analytical investigation of the relations and properties of geometrical magnitudes. It is divided into Determinate and Indeterminate Geometry, according as the number of possible solutions in any given case is limited or unlimited.

(2) Descriptive Geometry: Geometry of which the feature is to represent solid bodies with accurate form, perspective, &c., on paper or other plane surface.

(3) Elementary Geometry: Geometry treating of points, lines, surfaces, or the ordinary solids, as distinguished from Conic Sections, &c., called the Higher Geometry.

(5) Higher Geometry: ¶ (4.)

(6) Plane Geometry: Geometry relating to surfaces, or to lines drawn or points placed upon them.

(7) Solid Geometry: Geometry relating to solids.

(8) To hang by geometry: To hang or be out of shape or in confusion.

gě-ō-mūr-I-čite, s. [Gr. gēō, for gēōs=belonging to the land, and muriḱē=a shrub, the tamarisk.] [MYRICA.]

Min.: A waxy, pulverulent mineral, consisting of carbon 80.59, hydrogen 13.42, and oxygen 5.99=100. It occurs in the brown coal deposit at Gesterwitz. The wax may have been derived from fossil trees. (Dana.)

gě-ō-nāv-I-gā-tion, s. [Gr. gēō, for gēōs=belonging to the land, and Eng. navigation (q. v.).] A term proposed for that branch of the science of navigation in which the position of a ship at sea is determined by reference to some other spot on the surface of the earth. Opposed to Cœlo-navigation (q. v.).

gě-ōn-ō-mŷ, s. [Gr. gēō, for gēōs=belonging to the earth, and nomos=a law.] The science of the physical laws relating to the earth, as geology and physical geography.

gě-ōph-a-gism, s. [Gr. gē=the earth, and phagein=to eat.] The act or habit of eating earth, as dirt, clay, &c. [DIET-EATING.]

gě-ōph-a-gist, s. [GEOPHAGISM.] One who practices geophagism; one who eats dirt.

gě-ōph-a-gŷ, s. [Gr. gē=the earth, and phagein=to eat.] The same as GEOPHAGISM (q. v.).

gě-ōph-I-lā, s. [Gr. gēō, for gēōs=belonging to the land, and phileō=to love.] So named from the creeping habit of the plants.

Bot.: A genus of Cinchonaceæ, tribe Coffeæ, family Psychotridæ. The species are found in tropical America and the East Indies. The root of Geophila reniformis is purgative or emetic.

gě-ō-phīl-I-dā, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. geophil(us), and Lat. fem. adj. pl. suff. -idā.]

Zool.: A family of Centipedes, order Chilognatha. The body is very slender and thread-like, with many segments, and a corresponding number of pairs of feet.

gě-ōph-I-lūs, s. [GEOPHILA.]

1. Zool.: The typical genus of the family Geophilidæ (q. v.). Geophilus electricus is found near London and elsewhere. It is sometimes seen upon the doorsteps of country houses. When excited it emits an electric light.

2. Palæont.: Count Munster has described a centipede, called by him Geophilus proavrus, from the lithographic slates of Solenhofen, which belong to the Upper Jurassic rocks.

gě-ō-pōn-ic, a. & s. [Fr. gēoponique, from Gr. gē=the earth, and ponikos=toilsome; ponos=labor.]

A. As adj.: Pertaining to agriculture or the tillage of the earth.

B. As substantive:

1. An agriculturist, a farmer.

2. (Pl.) The art or science of tilling the earth; agriculture.

gě-ō-pōn-ic-al, a. [Eng. geoponic; -al.] Of or pertaining to agriculture or the tillage of the earth; geponic.

gě-ō-ra-mā, s. [Gr. gēō, for gēōs=belonging to the earth, and horama=a view; Fr. gėorama.] A concave globe on the inside of which the countries, oceans, &c., of the earth are represented to the spectators, who stand on a framework inside.

Geor-diē, s. [A Scotch dimin. of George (q. v.).] A guinea. [GEORGE, 3.]

"As lang's my tail, where, through the steeks,
The yellow-lettered Geordie keeks."
Burns: The Two Dogs.

Geordie safety-lamp, s.

Mining: A safety-lamp invented for use in coal mines by George Stephenson.

gě-ō-rē-tin-ic, a. [Pref. geo-, and retinic (q. v.).]

Min.: Akin to retene, and derived from the earth.

georetinic-acid, s.

Min.: A name formerly given to Brücknerellite (q. v.).

George, s. [Lat. Georgius, from Gr. gēorgos=a cultivator of the earth; gē, and ergon=work.]

1. The insignia of the order of the Garter; a figure of St. George on horseback, engaging the dragon, worn pendent from the collar by the knights of that order. [GARTER, s.]

"The George and Garter dangling from that bed, Where tawdry yellow strove with dirty red."
Pope: Moral Essays, iii. 303.

*2. A guinea, from the figure of St. George on the reverse.

*3. A kind of loaf, said to have been stamped with a figure of St. George.

"Cubbed in a cabin, on a mattress laid,
On a brown george, with lousy swabbers fed."
Dryden: Persius, sat. v.

¶ The name Brown George is used at Oxford for the large coarse earthenware water jugs used instead of cans. (Eng.)

George-noble, s. A gold coin, current at six shillings and eight pence in the reign of Henry VIII.; so called from the figure of St. George on the reverse.

Geor-gī-a, s. Farthest south and latest settled of the thirteen original States. Named in honor of George II.; settled by English at Savannah, 1733. Originally a part of South Carolina and claimed by Spain. Severe wars with Creeks and Cherokees settled by treaties 1790 and 1791. Seceded January, 1861; re-admitted December, 1870. Active in the Revolution, suffering badly from devastation by English. Many hard-fought battles during civil war, including Atlanta, &c. Climate, at the north mild and extremely healthy; hot in the lowlands. Range of temperature, 30° to 105°. Average, winter 49°, summer 82°. Rainfall averages 55 inches.

Geor-gī-an, s. [See def.] A native or inhabitant of Georgia, a region on the south of the Caucasus, or of Georgia, one of the southern states of the American Union.

Geor-gī-an, a. [Lat. Georgius=George.] Belonging or relating to the reigns of the four Georges in Great Britain, 1714-1830; as, the Georgian era.

"One Georgian star adorns the skies,
She myriads found below."

Cowper: Queen's Visit, March 17, 1789.

geor-gīc, *geor-gīck, a. & s. [Lat. georgica (carmina)=georgic (poems), from georgicus=relating to husbandry; Gr. georgikos, from georgia=husbandry; gē=the earth, and ergon=work.]

A. As adj.: Pertaining or relating to agriculture or husbandry; treating of rural affairs.

"Here I peruse the Mantuan's georgic strains,
And learn the labors of Italian swains."
Gay: Rural Sports, i.

B. As subst.: A poem on husbandry or rural affairs. It is the title of four books on husbandry written by Virgil.

"A georgic, therefore, is some parts of the science of husbandry put into a pleasing dress, and set off with all the beauties and embellishments of poetry."—Addison: On Virgil's Georgics.

geor-gīc-al, a. [Eng. georgic; -al.] The same as GEORGIC (q. v.).

Geor-gī-ūm SI'-dūs, s. [Lat.,=the Georgian star, i. e., the star discovered under the auspices of King George III. of England.]

Astron.: The name given by Sir William Herschel to a planet discovered by him on March 13, 1781. Laplace, disliking the innovation of elevating one's sovereign to the sky, substituted for the name of King George that of the planet's discoverer, fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāl, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mātē, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

Herschel. The latter appellation is still widely accepted, but as the other planets were all called by the names of classic gods, Bode suggested the appellation of URANUS (q. v.). See also HERSCHEL.

gē-or-gōs, s. [Gr.; see GEORGIC.] A husbandman. (Spenser.)

gē-ō-rhŷ-chl-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. georhynch(us) (q. v.); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idec.]

Zool.: Mole-rats; a family of Rodentia, with a large head, small eyes and ears, a short or deficient tail, and five toes on each foot. They occur in Asia, Africa, and Southeastern Europe, burrowing like moles.

gē-ō-rhŷ-chūs, s. [Gr. georhychos=digging or throwing up the earth; gē=the earth, and orysō=to dig.]

Zool.: The typical genus of the family Georhynchidae (q. v.). Georhynchus capensis does damage to gardens at the Cape of Good Hope.

gē-ō-rŷs-sl-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. georysus, and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idec.]

Entom.: A family of beetles, tribe Clavicornes. The body is short, inflated, and nearly globular. The tarsi appear to have only four articulations. The antennae have nine joints, the last three forming a knob.

gē-ō-rŷs-sūs, gē-ō-ris-sūs, s. [Gr. geō, for gēios=belonging to the land, and orysō=to dig.]

Entom.: The typical genus of the family Georysidae (q. v.).

gē-ō-saur-ūs, s. [Gr. geō, for gēios=belonging to the land, and saura, sauros=a lizard.]

Palaeont.: The remains of a reptile which, if entire, would probably have been nine or ten feet long. They were found by Semmering in white lias, at Monheim in Franconia, and are now in the British Museum. Semmering called the animal Lacerta gigantea. Cuvier believed it intermediate between the Crocodiles and Monitors, but most nearly allied to the latter. It does not figure in Professor Huxley's enumeration of Crocodilian genera.

gē-ōs-cō-pŷ, s. [Gr. geō, for gēios=belonging to the earth, and skopeō=to see.] Knowledge of the earth; ground or soil gained by inspection.

gē-ō-sē-lān-īc, a. [Gr. geō, for gēios=belonging to the earth, and selēnē=the moon.] Pertaining or relating to the earth and the moon, with reference to their joint action or mutual relations.

gē-ō-stāt-īc, a. [Gr. geō, for gēios=belonging to the earth, and Eng. static (q. v.).] Sustaining the earth. (Used only in the compound.)

geostatic-arch, s.

Arch.: A linear arch of a figure suited to sustain a pressure similar to that of the earth, which consists, in a given vertical plane, of a pair of conjugate pressures, one vertical and proportional to the depth below a given plane, horizontal or sloping; and the other parallel to the horizontal or sloping plane, and bearing to the vertical pressure a certain constant ratio depending on the nature of the material.

gē-ō-tēc-tōn-īc, a. [Gr. geō, for gēios=belonging to the earth, and tektōnikos=pertaining to building.] Pertaining to the construction of the earth.

geoter, s. [A. S. geotere.] One who pours out; a cafter.

gē-ō-teu-this, s. [Gr. geō, for gēios=belonging to the earth, and teuthis=a kind of cuttle-fish or squid.]

Palaeont.: A genus of Teuthidae from the Upper Lias.

gē-ō-thēr-mīc, a. [Gr. geō, for gēios=belonging to the earth, and Eng. thermic (q. v.).] Of or relating to the internal temperature of the earth.

gē-ō-thēr-mōm-ē-tēr, s. [Gr. geō, for gēios=belonging to the earth, and Eng. thermometer (q. v.).] An instrument for measuring the earth's heat at different depths, as in mines and wells. The temperature rises about 1° F. for every seventy or eighty feet of descent.

gē-ōt-īc, a. [Gr. gē=the earth.] Belonging to earth; terrestrial. (Bailey.)

gē-ō-trōp-īc, a. [Gr. geō, for gēios=belonging to the land, and trōpos=a turn, a direction, or trōpē=a turn, turning about; trēpō=to turn.]

Bot. (of a plant): Turning toward the earth; manifesting geotropism.

gē-ōt-rō-pism, s. [Gr. geō, for gēios=belonging to the land, and trōpos, or trōpē=a turning, and Eng. &c., suff. -ism.] (GEOTROPIC.)

Bot.: The tendency exhibited by a young plant to turn toward the earth, i. e., to direct its roots in that direction, while heliotropism, or a tendency to turn toward the sun, is manifested by the stem and leaves.

"Positive geotropism or bending toward the center of the earth, will be called by us geotropism."—Darwin: Movements of Plants, p. 6.

gē-ō-trū-pēs, s. [Gr. geō, for gēios=belonging to the earth, and trupēs=to bore.]

Entom.: The typical genus of the family Geotrupidae (q. v.). Geotrupes stercorarius is the Drone-beetle, which flies abroad on summer evenings.

gē-ō-trū-pi-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. geotrup(es) (q. v.); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idec.]

Entom.: Drone scarabs; a family of Lamellicorn beetles, differing from the typical Scarabaeidae in their corneous mandibles. They mostly frequent dung, or the fungi called Boleti. [GEOTRUPES.]

gē-ō-trū-pi-næ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. geotrup(es) (q. v.); and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idec.]

Entom.: The name given by Macleay, Swainson, &c., to a sub-family of Scarabaeidae, identical with the family Geotrupidae (q. v.).

gē-phŷ-rē-ā, s. [Gr. gephyra=a dam, mound, or mole; a bridge; a tunnel, and Lat. neut. pl. adj. suff. -ea.]

Zool.: Spoon-worms; a class of annulose animals, division Anarthropoda. It consists of long worm-like marine animals indistinctly annulated, but not divided into segments. There are occasionally bristles, but no other locomotive appendages. The sexes are generally separate, and there is a metamorphosis.

gēp-ōn, s. [JUPON.]

ger, v. t. [GAR.]

ger, s. [Heb. gerah=(1) summation, (2) a grain, a bean, (3) the weight and money described in the definition.]

1. Heb. money: The smallest piece of money, being the twentieth part of a shekel. This would be about three cents. Gesenius thinks that the gerah was not a coin, but was reckoned by means of the beans [etym.] of the Carob tree, Ceratonia siliqua. [CAROB.]

"A shekel is twenty gerahs."—Exod. xxx. 13.

(Cf. also Lev. xvii. 25; Num. iii. 47, xviii. 16.)

2. Hebrew weights: A weight corresponding to No. 1.

gēr-ā-nī-ā-čē-s, s. pl. [Lat. gerani(um), and fem. adj. pl. suff. -acec.]

Bot.: The typical order of the alliance Geraniales. It consists of herbaceous plants or shrubs with tumid stems, separable at the joints. Leaves either opposite or alternate; if the latter, then they are opposite the peduncles. Stipules membranous; flowers white, red, yellow, or purple; sepals five, persistent, ribbed, unequal, one of them sometimes accrete, spurred at the base; petals five or by abortion four; unguiculate stamens, generally monadelphous, twice or thrice as many as the petals; ovary with five carpels, ultimately forming five one-seeded cells; styles five, cohering, round the torus, from which they are separable. Sixteen genera and about 750 species are known. They are found in temperate or hot climates, rarely in the arctic regions. They are often astringent and aromatic, abounding in vegetable oil. Lindley in his Vegetable Kingdom, made Oxalidaceæ and Balsaminaceæ distinct orders from Geraniaceæ.

gēr-rā-nī-āl, a. [Mod. Lat. geraniales (q. v.).]

Bot.: Akin to Geranium, having for their type Geranium.

geranial-alliance, s.

Bot.: The same as GERANIALES (q. v.).

gēr-rā-nī-ā-lēg, s. pl. [Latin gerani(um), and masc. or fem. pl. adj. suff. -ales.]

Bot.: An alliance of hypogynous exogens, with monodichlamydeous, symmetrical flowers, axile placentae, an imbricated calyx, a twisted corolla, definite stamens, and an embryo with little or no albumen. Lindley includes under it Linaceæ, Chlenaceæ, Oxalidaceæ, Balsaminaceæ, and Geraniaceæ (q. v.).

gēr-rā-nī-ē-s, s. pl. [Lat. gerani(um), and fem. pl. adj. suff. -eac.]

Bot.: A tribe of Geraniaceæ, when the fuller term is used to comprehend not merely the geraniums, but the balsams, and the wood-sorrels. Its characters are the same as those given above to Geraniaceæ (q. v.).

gēr-rā-nī-ēne, s. [Eng., &c., gerani(um); -ene (Chem.).]

Chem.: A terpene, C₁₀H₁₆, obtained by the action of phosphorus pentoxide P₂O₅ on geraniol. It is a liquid, boiling at 164°, and smells like fresh mulberries. It oxidizes rapidly in the air. It unites with HCl, forming a liquid compound.

gēr-rā-nī-ōl, s. [Eng., &c., gerani(um), and Lat. ol(eum)=oil.]

Chem.: C₁₀H₁₆O. Obtained by fractional distillation of geranium oil. A colorless, strongly refracting liquid, boiling at 233°. It is insoluble in water, soluble in alcohol and ether; when fused with potash it yields isovalerianic acid; by the action of nitric acid, it is converted into nitrobenzene, oxalic acid, and other substances.

gēr-ā-nī-ūm, s. [Lat. geranium and geranion =Ger. geranion=the plant Cranesbill, from geranos=a crane. Pliny makes Geranion a group of plants, including three types, probably Myrrhis, Erodium, and Geranium (q. v.).]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A term most frequently applied to any of the cultivated Pelargoniums. These belong to the Geraniaceæ, but are not the typical genus.

2. A book name, and partly a popular one, for the genus Geranium. [II.]

II. Bot.: The typical genus of the order Geraniaceæ and the alliance Geraniales. The flowers are regular, on one or two-flowered axillary peduncles; the stamens are ten, free or connate at the base, and hypogynous. Geranium sanguineum is a perennial plant with one-flowered peduncles. It is found in dry rocky places, on sandy shores, and on mountains.

G. sylvaticum, G. pratense, and G. pyrenaicum are perennial, with two-flowered peduncles. Other common species are G. molle, G. rotundifolium, G. pusillum, G. columbinum, G. dissectum, G. robertianum, and G. lucidum. The root of geranium contains more tannin than quino does, and is a very powerful astringent. Bigelow considers it specially valuable in the treatment of diseases continued through debility, after their existing cause has been removed. The tubers of G. parviflorum are eaten in Van Diemen's Land, where it is called the Native Carrot.

Indian Geranium is the name given by perfumers to Andropogon nardus; and the Nettle-geranium is Cotula fruticulosa.

gerant (as zhā-rān), s. [Fr.] The acting partner or manager of a joint stock association, newspaper establishment, &c.

gēr-ar-čŷ, s. [Low Lat. gerarchia, for hierarchia.] A hierarchy (q. v.).

ger-ard, s. [Etym. doubtful.] A devil, a fiend.

gēr-ard-ī-ā, s. [Named after John Gerard, who, in 1597, published a celebrated Herbal.]

Bot.: The typical genus of the tribe Gerardiæ (q. v.). It consists of handsome plants, with pink, rose-colored, or yellow flowers, growing in this country and the East Indies.

gēr-ard-ī-ē-s, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. gerardi(a), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -eac.]

Bot.: A tribe of Scrophulariaceæ, sub-order Rhinanthideæ.

gērb, s. [Fr. gerbe.]

Her.: A sheaf; a garb (q. v.).

gēr-bil, s. [Fr. gerbille, from gerbo, the Arabic name.]

Zool.: Any species of the genus Gerbillus (q. v.).

gēr-bil-lūs, s. [GERBIL.]

Zool.: A genus of mammalia, family Muridæ, which it connects with the Dipodidæ, or Jerboas. The species are found in India, Egypt, Canada, Labrador, &c.

gēr-bu-ā, s. [JERBOA.]

gēr-dā, s. [A female name.]

Astron.: An asteroid, the 122d found; discovered by Peters, July 31, 1872.

I. Ordinary Language:

1. In the same sense as II.

2. That from which anything springs; the origin, source, or first principle of anything.

II. Physiol. & Bot.: The earliest stage in the existence of an organized being, the embryo or bud from which such a being develops. (Used either of plants or of animals.) [GERMINAL-VESELIC.]

germ-cell, s.

Bot. Physiol.: An oösphere, a female cell, a cell which cannot give rise to a new plant unless the power to do so be imparted to it by another cell standing to it in a relation of contrast.

germ-epithelium, s.

Anat.: Epithelium existing in the ovary, and having a certain relation to the origin of the ova.

1. Biol.: [BIOGENESIS.]

2. Pathol.: The theory that there exists for each definite disease of infectious origin a specific germ or protomycetes. Hauptmann, in the seventeenth century, suggested that epidemic diseases might be caused by the presence in the air of invisible germs, and since then many more or less plausible efforts have been made to explain the phenomena of contagion. In 1863, Dr. Beale advanced the theory that the active properties of vaccine lymph were contained in certain minute particles $\frac{1}{10000}$ inch in diameter, a theory which has since been shown to be correct. Dr. Braidwood and Mr. Vacher describe the contagion of measles as "sparkling, colorless bodies in the breath of patients," and Dr. Klein, in typhoid fever, has found minute organisms surrounding the affected intestinal glands. The blood of animals dead from splenic fever swarms with bacilli, which multiply and throw off spores that can be cultivated (as shown by the researches of Pasteur), and the crop continued from fluid to fluid. After seven or eight such crops, a rabbit or guinea-pig inoculated with the artificially developed contagium, dies from the same disease as the animal from which the contagion-germ was taken. It has long been known that tuberculosis was hereditary, but it was supposed to be non-infectious. The tubercular bacillus has been discovered. Koch has cultivated it, and communicated it to animals, in whose bodies it has been found after death. [LISTERISM.]

gërm, v. i. [GERM, s.] To sprout, to germinate, to come into existence.

gër-mäin, a. [GERMANE.]

gër-man (1), a. & s. [GERMANE.]

Bot.: The name given by Linnaeus to the ovary of a plant.

gër-min-al, a. & s. [Fr., from Lat. germen (genit. germinis)=a germ, a shoot.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to a germ or seed-bud.

B. As subst.: The name given in October, 1793, by the French Convention to the seventh month of the republican year. It commenced on March 21, and was the first spring month.

germinal-macula, s.

Anat. & Physiol.: The same as GERMINAL-SPOT (q. v.).

germinal-matter, s.

Anat. & Physiol.: The name given by Beale both to the protoplasm and the nucleus of an animal cell, the two, however, being considered different by most histologists.

germinal-membrane, s.

Anat. & Physiol.: The same as VITELLINE-MEMBRANE (q. v.).

germinal-pole, s.

Anat. & Physiol.: The name given by Quain to the central point from which development spreads in the ovum of a bird or mammal.

germinal-spot, s.

Anat. & Physiol.: A spot corresponding to the nucleolus of an animal cell. Called also the Germinal-macula.

germinal-vesicle, s.

1. Anat. & Physiol.: A delicate, spheroidal, inclosing membrane, with protoplasmic fluid and fine granules, constituting an essential part of the human or animal ovum. After a time it disappears. (Quain.)

2. Bot.: The germ of a future plant, analogous to the germinal-vesicle of animals. It is formed apparently before impregnation. Amici, Mohl, Müller, Henfrey, Hoffmeister, and Tulasne affirm its existence, while it is denied by Schleiden and Schacht.

gër-min-ant, a. [Lat. germinans, pr. par. of germino=to bud, to sprout; germen (genit. germinis)=a bud, a sprout.] Sprouting; beginning to bud or sprout; growing; developing.

gër-min-äte, v. i. & t. [Lat. germinatum, sup. of germino=to bud, to sprout; germen (genit. germinis)=a bud, a sprout; Fr. germer; Ital. germinare; Sp. germinar.]

A. Intrans.: To sprout; to shoot; to bud; to begin to vegetate as a plant.

"Paradise was made on the third day, when God caused the trees to germinate out of the earth."—H. More: Defence of the Philosophic Cabbala. (App.)

B. Transitive:

1. Lit.: To cause to sprout or bud.

2. Fig.: To shoot out; to put forth.

"Several French departments germinate a set of rebellious paper-leaves."—Carlyle: French Revolution.

gër-min-ä-tion, s. [Fr., from Lat. germinatio, from germinatum, sup. of germino=to bud, to sprout; Sp. germinación; Ital. germinazione.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: In the same sense as II. (q. v.).

"There's but little similitude betwix a terreous humidity and plantal germinations."—Glanvill: The Vanity of Dogmatizing, ch. xxi.

2. Fig.: The moral, mental, social, or political growth of an individual.

"The Duke of Buckingham had another kind of germination."—Wotton. (Johnson.)

II. Bot.: The first act of growth which takes place in an embryo plant. It cannot occur without the presence of water, heat, and atmospheric air, or, at least, of oxygen. Popularly water obtains the credit of the whole process, and it is undoubtedly true that seeds rapidly absorb it with the effect of softening the tissue, enabling the parts to distend, as well as dissolving those of them which are soluble, so that they may be taken into the circulation as growth proceeds. But heat also is necessary, and atmospheric air, to furnish oxygen, which is most effective if one part of it is diluted with three of nitrogen. Prior to germination the seed had in its composition some carbon, apparently to preserve it; with this the oxygen unites, forming carbon dioxide, which is thrown off. Meanwhile the parts of the seed have softened and distended; the embryo has swelled and burst its envelopes, after which the radicle is sent down into the ground, deriving its nourishment at first, however, from the cotyledons; the plumule rises upward, and the process of growth and development is completely in progress.

gër-min-ät-ive, adj. [Eng. germinat(e); -ive.]

Of or pertaining to germination; which germinates.

gër-mi-pär-i-tÿ, s. [Eng. germ, and Lat. paro=to bear.] Generation by germs.

gër-m-less, a. [Eng. germ, and priv. suffix -less.] Having no germs.

gër-m-ö-gën, s. [Eng. germ, and Gr. gennaō=to produce.]

Biology and Histology:

1. A uncelled polynuclear mass of protoplasm from which certain ova are developed.

2. The name given to the primary cell in certain embryonic forms.

ger-mount, s. [GARMENT.]

gër-m-üle, s. [Eng. germ, and dim. suffix -üle.] A little germ.

gër-n (1), gerne, v. i. [GRIN, v.] To grin, to snarl, to yawn.

Ichthy.: A genus of Sparidae, sub-family Menidinae. Gerres rhombeus is found in the West Indian Seas.

gër-ris, s. [Probably altered from Lat. gerres (q. v.).]

Entom.: A genus of Homoptera, sub-order Heteroptera, tribe Hydrocores (Water-bugs). They have an elliptical and elongate body, and triangular head with prominent eyes and no ocelli. The two front feet are short, the thighs of the others very long, the legs and tarsi not easily distinguishable. They are black insects, which glide about on the surface of stagnant waters with great agility, using their hind feet for the purpose without diving.

gër-rÿ-mân-dër, jër-rÿ-mân-dër, v. t. [From Elbridge Gerry, Governor of Massachusetts, at the time when the plan was devised.] To divide a state into political divisions, so as to give one party an unfair and unnatural advantage over others.

gers, gerss, s. [GRASS.]

gërs-dorff-ite, s. [Named from Hofrath von Gersdorff, who discovered the mineral in Styria.]

Min.: An isometric, pyritohedral, silver-white, steel-gray, or grayish-black mineral of metallic luster, its hardness 5.5, specific gravity 5.6 to 6.9. Composition: Arsenic, 45.5; sulphur, 19.4; nickel, 35.1 = 100. Varieties: (1) Normal Gersdorffite, (2) Lowe's Gersdorffite, (3) Amobite, (4) Plessite, and (5) Dobschanite. Found in Sweden, the Hartz Mountains, Styria, &c. (Dana.)

gër-ünd, s. [Lat. gerundium, from gerundus = to be done or carried out, fut. pass. part. of gero = to carry out.]

Gram.: Originally a part of the Latin verb used to express the meaning of the present infinitive active in cases where the infinitive should properly be in some case other than the nominative. The word is also applied by grammarians to a dative form of the infinitive in Anglo-Saxon, governed by the preposition to, and expressed by the suffix -e: as, clanne = to eat, faranne = to go. In Anglo-Saxon the gerund was used to express a purpose or end, like the Latin gerund or supine. In phrases such as "Fit for teaching, fond of learning," teaching and learning are not gerunds, but verbal nouns governed by the preposition, and representing Anglo-Saxon substantives in -ung.

gerund-grinder, s. A pedantic schoolmaster.

gë-rün'-di-äl, a. [Eng. gerund; -ial.]

Gram.: Pertaining to or of the nature of a gerund; as, a gerundial infinitive.

gë-ründ-ine, a. [See ext.] Of or pertaining to a gerund.

"If ever they get ends of gold and silver enough to serve that gerundine maw of yours, that without do will end in di and dum instantly."—Beaum. & Fllet. Wit at Several Weapons, i. 1.

"As this is the only known instance of the word, it is probable that it is only a misprint for gerundine = gerundive."

gë-ründ-ive, s. [Lat. gerundivus; Fr. gerondif.]

Gram.: Originally a name given by Latin grammarians to the future passive participle; now used in other languages to denote certain modifications of the verb, as in English the verbal noun in -ing when governed by a preposition, and in German the present participle with zu (= to) prefixed.

gë-ründ-ive-lÿ, adv. [Eng. gerundive; -ly.] After the manner of a gerund or gerundive; in place of a gerund or gerundive.

gë-rû-şî-a, s. [Gr. gerousia = an assembly of old men.]

Greek Antiq.: The senate of ancient Sparta [GERONTES.]

gër-vâ-ô, s. [JERBOA.]

gër-vil'-li-a, s. [Named after M. Gerville, a French naturalist.]

Palæont.: A genus of conchiferous mollusks, family Aiculidæ (Wing-shells). Known species thirty-seven, from the Carboniferous period to that of the Chalk.

gër-ÿ-ôn'-i-a, s. [Named after Geryon, a three-headed monster figuring in classical mythology. It was his cattle which Hercules brought away.]

Zoöl.: The typical genus of the family Geryonidæ (q. v.).

gër-ÿ-ôn'-i-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. geryoni (a), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zoöl.: A family of Discophora or Medusæ, order Gymnophthalmata. The vessels, four in number, are simple; the ovaries, also four, are placed in the vessels of the sub-umbrella; the tentacles vary in number. Some species at times make the seas in which they live luminous.

ges-arne, ges-erne, gis-erne, gys-erne, s. [GIZZARD.] A gizzard.

ges-en, ges-on, a. [GEASON.]

gëss-liñg, s. [GOSLING.]

gëss-nër-a, s. [Named by Linnaeus after the celebrated botanist Conrad Gesner, of Zurich.]

Bot.: The typical genus of the order Gesneraceæ (q. v.). The tubers are depressed, the inflorescence corymbose or panicle, the corolla much longer than the calyx, two-lipped, two to five conspicuous glands on the flower. They are from South America and the West Indies, and are plants of great beauty, chiefly with scarlet, purple, orange, or yellow flowers.

gëss-nër-ä'-çë-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Latin gesner (a), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -acæ.]

Bot.: Gesnerworts, an order of perigynous exogens, alliance Bignoniales. It consists of soft-wooded herbs or shrubs, sometimes climbing or creeping, and often springing from scaly tubers. Leaves opposite or whorled, without stipules. Flowers showy, in racemes or panicles, rarely solitary; scarlet, violet, or white. Calyx half adherent, five-parted. Corolla monopetalous, tubular, irregular, five-lobed; stamens two or four, in the latter case didynamous; ovary half superior, one-celled, with two parietal placentæ placed right and left of the axis; seeds many. Fruit capsular or succulent. It is divided into two sub-orders or tribes: Gesnerææ confined to the warmer parts of this country, and Crytandreeæ more widely distributed.

gëss-nër-ä-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. gesner (a), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -ææ.]

Bot.: A sub-order or tribe of Gesneraceæ (q. v.). The seeds have a small quantity of albumen, the fruit is partially adherent.

gëss-nër-wörts, s. pl. [Gesner, a proper name [GESNERA], and Eng. worts.]

Bot.: The name given by Lindley to the order Gesneraceæ (q. v.).

ges-on, a. [GEASON.]

ges-sare, s. [GUESSER.]

gësse, v. t. & i. [GUESS, v.]

gësse (1), s. [GUESS, s.]

"Who by the noise and gests they make, give notice to their keeper, who presently puts them by, and digs the trefree for himself."—Str A. Bulfour: Letters, p. 71.

5. A race; a family.

gëst (2), gesse, s. [O. Fr. jiste = a bed, a couch.] [GIST.]

1. A stage; a rest, or stop in traveling.

"God hath designed the cross, the constant post and stage in our gesses to heaven."—Hammond: Works, iv. 485.

2. A journal or roll of the several days and stages prefixed in the progress of English sovereigns; the appointed time itself.

gëst (3), geste (2), s. [GUEST.]

gest-halle, s. [GUEST-HALL.]

gest-hus, s. [GUEST-HOUSE.]

gest (4), geist, s. [JOIST.]

1. A joist or beam for supporting a floor.

2. A beam. (Used in a general sense.)

gëst, geste, gest-en, gest-yn, v. t. [GEST (1), s.] To compose or recite gests or legendary tales.

"I can not geste."—Chaucer: C. T., 17, 387.

gëst'-ant, a. [Lat. gestans, pr. par. of gesto, frequent. of gero = to carry.] Carrying; hence, laden, burdened.

"Clouds gestant with heat."—E. B. Browning.

gës-tä'-tion, s. [Fr., from Lat. gestatio = a carrying, from gestatus, pa. par. of gesto = to carry; Ital. gestazione.]

*I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) Originally, in a general sense, the act of carrying; the state of being carried.

"Gestation, an exercise of the body, by being carried in coach, litter, upon horseback."—P. Holland: Pity; Explanation of the Words of Art.

(2) The act of wearing, as clothes or ornaments.

(3) Gesture, gesticulation; deportment, carriage.

2. Fig.: The progress of any plan from inception to fulfillment.

II. Physiol.: The act of carrying young in the uterus from the time of conception to that of parturition. The average time of a woman's pregnancy is nine solar months, or about 280 days, though it may be as few as seven or as many as ten.

"The arrangement of the muscular fibers is best studied in the uterus at the full period of gestation."—Quain: Anatomy, ii. 464.

¶ The period of gestation is shorter in carnivorous than in herbivorous animals. The young of the former are also less developed at birth, their eyes not opening for several days thereafter. Herbivorous animals: The elephant has 20 or 21 months; gestation; the giraffe, 14 months; dromedary, 12 months; buffalo, 12 months; ass, 12 months; mare, upward of 11 months; rhinoceros, 9 months; cow, 9 months; many of the larger deer, over 8 months; sheep and goat, 5 months; pig, 4 months. Rodents: Beaver, 4 months; dormouse, 31 days; rabbit, 30 to 31 days; squirrel and rat, 28 days; guinea-pig, 21 days or less. Carnivorous: Bear, 6 months; lion, 108 days; puma, 79 days; fox, wolf, and dog, 62-63 days; cat, 55 or 56 days. Pouched animals: Kangaroo, 39 days; opossum, 26 days. Cetaceous animals: Greenland whale, about 10 months. The most common duration for the varieties of monkeys is 7 months. Oviparous animals: The goose sits 30 days; swan, 42 days; hens, 21 days; ducks, 30 days; pea-hens and turkeys, 28 days; canaries, 14 days; pigeons, 21 days; parrots, 40 days. The periods are subject to considerable variation, especially in domestic animals, and various conditions modify the period, of which the above are only the averages.

Anthrop. Gesture language is the name given to those movements of the hands and other parts of the body by means of which people of low culture eke out the deficiencies of their vocabulary, and personify the thoughts. Gesture-language exists wherever man is found. The expression of pain or surprise, the threatening shake of the head, the pointing of the finger possess the same messages for the cultured American and the debased savage. [LANGUAGE, ONOMATOPEIA.]

"Gesture-language is instinct—the heritage of the days, it may be, of the days before man acquired articulate language, or differed thus far from the brute beast."—Savage: Nature and Science of Language, i. 98.

Shakesp.: Measure for Measure, l. 5.

Crabb thus discriminates between to get, to gain, to obtain, and to procure: "Get is not only the most general in its sense, but in its application; it may be substituted in almost every case for the other terms; get is promiscuously used for whatever comes to the hand, whether good or bad, desirable or not desirable, sought for or not; but gain, obtain, and procure always include either the wishes, or the instrumentality of the agent, or both together. The word gain is peculiarly applicable to whatever comes to us fortuitously; for what we gain constitutes our good fortune. . . . To obtain and procure exclude the idea of chance, and suppose exertions directed to a specific end: but the former may include the exertions of others; the latter is particularly employed for one's own personal exertions." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) *get-nothing, s. An idle person; a ne'er-do-well.

gey's-ēr, *gey's-ir, s. [Icel. geysa=to gush.]

Geology, &c.:

1. Certain intermittent hot springs in various portions of the earth, the most notable specimens being those in the Yellowstone region of the Rocky Mountains and those of the southwestern division of Iceland, about thirty miles from Mount Hecle. Nearly one hundred of the latter are said to break out within a circle of two miles. Few of them play longer than five or six minutes at a time, although sometimes they go on for half an hour. The largest is called the Great Geyser. It has a pipe 78 feet in vertical depth, and from eight to ten feet in diameter, but gradually widening as it rises into the basin. The latter is 56 feet long by 46 feet broad, and is lined with an incrustation of silica deposited from the hot water, the process being aided by the alkali soda, which, with minute quantities of various salts, exists in the water. When the geyser is about to act, subterranean noises are heard like the distant firing of cannon, and the earth is slightly shaken; then a column of the liquid element is thrown up to the height of 100 or 200 feet. Steam after a time makes its way out of the rent, and the fountain ceases to play. The second in size is the Strokkur. If stones or turf be thrown down its pipe, an eruption will follow in a few minutes, and eject them with great force. Geyser action is produced by the heating of the lower part of the geyser tube, as Professor Tyndall was able to show experimentally.

2. Any similar intermittent hot springs. There are geysers in New Zealand, in the Northern Island, as remarkable as those of the Yellowstone Park or of Iceland. They are on three parallel lines running in a direction north 36° E. by the compass. (Lyell: Princip. of Geol. (11th ed., 1872), ch. xxxiii.)

gey'-sēr-ite, *gey'-sēr-ite, s. [Eng. &c., geyser, and suff. -ite (Min.) (q. v.).]

5. Anything given with a corrupt motive; a bribe.

"Thou shalt not wrest judgment, thou shalt not respect persons, neither take a gift; for a gift doth blind the eyes of the wise."—Deuteronomy xvi. 19.

6. A natural quality, talent, or endowment; a faculty, a power; a talent, considered as conferred by God.

"And Conversation in its better part May be esteemed a gift, and not an art."
Cowper: Conversation, 4.

II. Theol. (pl.): Endowments, some of them high; others—and these the majority—superhuman, conferred on individuals in the early church by the Holy Spirit, whence they are called spiritual gifts. St. Paul enumerates the word of wisdom, that of knowledge; faith, the gift of having ability to work miracles, to prophesy, to succeed in the discerning of spirits, to speak with divers tongues or interpret those tongues when spoken by others. (1 Cor. xii. 1, 8-10, &c.)

benefit of the receiver; the present is an act of kindness, courtesy, or respect; it contributes to the pleasure of the receiver. The gift is private, and benefits the individual; the donation is public, and serves some general purpose. The value of a gift is often heightened by being given opportunely; the value of a present often depends upon the value we have for the giver."

(2) He thus discriminates between gift, endowment, and talent: "Gift and endowment both refer to the act of giving and endowing, and of course include the idea of something given, and something received: the word talent contains no such collateral idea. When we speak of a gift, we refer in our minds to a giver; when we speak of an endowment, we refer in our minds to the receiver; when we speak of a talent, we only think of its intrinsic quality. The gift is either supernatural or natural; the endowment is only natural. Talents are either natural or acquired, or in some measure of a mixed nature; they denote powers without specifying the source from which they proceed. . . . An endowment is a gift, but a gift is not always an endowment; a talent may also be either a gift or an endowment, but it is frequently distinct from both." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) gift-rope, s.

Naut.: A rope attached to a boat to be used in towing it astern of a ship.

*gift, v. t. [GIFT, s.]

gig-our, s. [O. Fr. gigueour; Icel. gigjari; M. H. Ger. gigore; Ger. geiger.] A fiddler.

Gila (pron. Hē-la), s.

Geog.: The name of a river in the south western portion of the United States, rising in New Mexico, flowing 680 miles and entering Arizona, where it joins the Colorado river.

Gila monster, s. [For etymology see supra.]

Zool.: A large, knotty-skinned lizard ranging the district watered by the river described ante. It has venom fangs, and terrible stories, which naturalists are not yet willing to believe entirely, are told of its deadly powers.

Gil-bēr-tine, a. & s. [Named after their patron, Gilbert, lord of Sempringham in Lincolnshire, England, about A. D. 1148.]

A. As substantive:

Ch. Hist.: One of a monastic order which arose in England in the twelfth century. The monks observed the rule of St. Augustine; the nuns, that of St. Benedict.

B. As adj.: Of or belonging to the order described under A.

Gil-bērt-ite, s. [Named by Thomson after Mr. Davies Gilbert, a former President of the Royal Society of England.]

Min.: A whitish, silky mineral; its hardness 2.75; specific gravity 2.65. Composition: Silica 45.15; alumina 40.11; protoxide of iron 2.43; magnesia 1.90; lime 4.17; and water 4.25. Apparently an impure kaolinite. Occurs near St. Austle in Cornwall, England. (Dana.)

gild, *gilde, *gild-en, *gyld, *gyld-yn, v. t. [A. S. gyldan=to pay; Icel. gylla=to gild.]

I. Lit.: To wash over with gold; to overlay with gold either in leaf or powder; to coat with gold.

"The gilded coach, indeed, which is now annually admired by the crowd, was not yet a part of his state."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. iil.

II. Figuratively:

1. To give a golden color or appearance to; to cause to shine or become bright like gold.

"And yet, what worth?—what good is given to men,
More solid than the gilded coats of heaven?"
Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. iil.

2. To make resplendent with bright colors.

"He cannot skim the ground like summer birds Pursuing gilded flies."
Couper: Task, iv. 922.

*3. To brighten, to cheer; to give a bright, happy appearance or character to.

"Let oft good humor, mild and gay, Gild the calm evening of your day."

"Ane gild ore is appriest [in Orkney] to 15 meales, and a ne wedder is four meales."
Skene: De Verb. Sign., s. v. Serplith.

gild-ër (1), gyld-er, s. [Eng. gild; -er.] One who gilds or overlays anything with gold.

"No conning artificer, caruer, painter, nor gylder, with such other lyke of what occupacyon soeuer they be or haue bene to thy comiditie, shal neuermore be found againe."
Bale: Image, pt. iii.

*gild-ër (2), s. [GUILDER.] A coin, value about 35 cents. (Shakesp.: Comedy of Errors, iv. 1.)

gild-ing, pr. par., a. & s. [GILD, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) The act, process, or art of overlaying with gold; or of applying gold in leaf, powder, or liquid, to surfaces of wood, metal, leather, paper, &c. Gilding is performed: By laying on gold-leaf; by applying gold in amalgam, the mercury being subsequently evaporated; by electroplating; by a sheet of metal soldered to the cheaper foundation metal; and by enameling.

(2) Gold in leaf, powder, or liquid, applied to any surface.

2. Fig.: Any outward decoration or covering, designed to give a fair appearance to anything.

"Could laureate Dryden pimp and friar engage . . .
And I not strip the gilding off a knave?"
Pope: Satires, i. 115.

II. Photog.: The treatment of the finished daguerotype-plate with a salt of gold—generally the hyposulphite of gold and soda—which determines the deposition of finely divided gold upon the vaporous mercurial deposit of which the picture consists. By this means permanence is imparted to the picture.

gilding-metal, s. A special kind of brass, with a high percentage of copper, used to make objects which are to be gilded by electrolysis.

gilding-size, s. A viscid composition laid upon an object to hold a surface of gold-leaf. The book-binder uses glaire, white of egg; the oil-gilder uses a mixture of linseed-oil and ochre.

† 1. Burnished gilding: Distemper gilding polished by burnisher; used especially in picture-frames.

(2) Chemical-gilding: Gilding produced by galvanic action in the bath, or by affinity.

(3) Cold-gilding: Effected by rubbing the annealed metal with gilding powder by means of a piece of cork dipped in salt water, and polishing with steel-burnisher.

(4) Distemper-gilding: Applied to wood, plaster, or marble, which is coated with size, successive coats of finely powdered whiting, and faced by rubbing with sandpaper between each. Gold-size is then applied, then the leaf, which is polished with an agate or dog's tooth.

(5) Electro-gilding: [ELECTROPLATING.]

(6) Friction-gilding: [Cold-gilding.]

(7) German-gilding: The same as ELECTROPLATING (q. v.).

(8) Immersion-gilding: Effected by dipping the metallic article into a solution of pyrophosphate of soda in which terchloride of gold has been dissolved.

(9) Leaf-gilding: The process of coating the paper or vellum with gum-water or glaire, laying on the leaf-gold and polishing with an agate.

(10) Mechanical-gilding: The name given to any process in which the gold is made to adhere by glue.

gil'-hoët-ër, s. [Eng. gill (4), and hooter.] A provincial English name sometimes given to the screech-owl.

gill (1), gil, gyll, gylle, s. [Dan. gielle; Sw. gal=a gill; Icel. gjölnar (pl.)=gills; Gael. gial=a jaw.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. In the same sense as II. 1.

"The leviathan . . . at his gills Draws in, and at his trunk spouts out, a sea."
Milton: P. L., vii. 415.

2. The flap that hangs below the beak of a fowl, as the wattles in a turkey.

"The turkeycock hath great and swelling gills, and the hen hath less."
Bacon: Natural History.

3. The flesh under or about the chin.

"In many there is no paleness at all; but, contrariwise, redness about the cheeks and gills."
Bacon: Natural History.

II. Technically (pl.):

1. Ichthy.: The branchiæ of fishes; a double row of long, compressed, slender-pointed processes, extending, like the teeth of a comb, from the convex side of a branchial arch, and supported by a delicate membrane. Gills may be free or fixed. In Myxinoidei there are only gill-sacs. In some osseous fishes, certain of the branchial arches support only one series of processes, called uniserial or half-gills; in most cases they have biserial or whole gills. Gills, as a rule, are pectinated; there are also, however, plicated and tufted gills. The main purpose of the gills is to expose the venous blood, in a state of minute subdivision, to the influence of streams of water.

2. Entom.: Hair or leaf-like processes projecting from the body of some aquatic insects, and containing one or more tracheæ, and their ramifications communicating with those of the body generally. Insects thus equipped do not need to rise to the surface of the water to breathe. (Griffith & Henfrey.)

3. Bot.: The lamellæ or parallel plates on the underpart of the pileus of an Agaricus. They constitute the hymenium in which the spores lie.

Ichthy.: The arches supporting the gills. They are generally five in number.

gill-bar, s. One of the five branchial arches.

Ichthy.: The same as GILL-LID (q. v.).

Ichthy.: A membrane attached to the posterior edge of the gill-lid, immediately closing the gill-opening.

Ichthy.: The lid or covering of the gills.

gill-net, s. A net suspended in a stream, having meshes which allow the heads of the fish to pass, and which catch in the gills to prevent the fish from detaching itself.

Ichthy.: One of the rudimentary gills constituted by sacs, occurring in the Myxinoidei and Lampreys. A gill of the ordinary fishes is the homologue, not of a single gill-sac, but of the continuous halves of two of them.

gill (2), ghyll, gille, gylle, s. [Icel. gil = a deep, narrow glen; geil = a ravine.] A fissure in a hill; a ravine with a river running through it; a brook, a ghyll, a gully.

gill (3), s. [Fr. aiguille=a needle.]

Flax-dressing: A hackle; a series of points which divide the ribbons of flax fiber into finer parallel filaments ready for drawing and spinning; a porcupine.

Flax-dressing: A machine in which stricks of wax are drawn out into slivers; doubled and combined with other slivers, and redrawn until they assume the character of rovings, and are ready for spinning. A spreader. The name gill-frame is derived from a number of vertical needles forming a comb, through which the line passes to the drawing-roller; the gill is attached to a fuller-bar, which rises and falls at intervals, and alternately detains and releases the line, which, by a series of operations, is converted from a strick to a sliver, and then to a roving.

gill (4), s. [A shortened form of Gillian=Lat. Juliana.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A girl, a sweetheart, a lass. [GILLIAN.]

2. Malt liquor medicated with ground-ivy.

II. Bot.: Ground-ivy, Nepeta glechoma. It is also called Gill-creep-by-the-hedge.

Bot.: Alehoof.

gill-flirt, s. A wanton girl, a flirt.

gill-house, s. A house where gill is sold.

gill-run-by-the-sheet, s.

Bot.: Saponaria officinalis.

gill (5), gille, gylle, s. [O. Fr. gelle=a measure for wine; cf. Low Lat. gillo, gella=a wine vessel, a measure; Ir. jale=a large bowl; Eng. gallon (q. v.).]

1. A measure of capacity, containing the fourth part of a pint. The standard gill now in use contains 8.665 cubic inches.

*2. A kind of measure among tin-miners, equal to a pint.

gill-lar-òo, s. [Irish(?).]

Ichthy.: A variety of the Common Trout, in which the coats of the stomach are said to be thickened like the gizzard of birds by feeding on shell-fish.

gill-lén-I-a, s. [Named by Mönch after Dr. Arnold Gillen, a German botanist.]

Bot.: A genus of Rosaceæ, family Spiræidæ. The root of Gillenia trifoliata and that of G. stipulacea are emetic, and perhaps tonic. They are used in this country as Ipecacuanha.

gill-lét, s. [A dimin. of gill (4), s.; cf. giglet.] A sportive or wanton girl or woman; a giglet.

gill-lí-an, s. [A softened form of Juliana, the female name corresponding to Lat. Julius.] A girl, a sweetheart; a wanton or loose girl.

gill-lie, s. [Gael. gille=a boy, a gillie.] In the Highlands a man-servant, an out-door attendant; especially one who accompanies his master while hunting.

gill-lîeg-I-a, s. [Named after Dr. Gillies of Menado in Chili.]

Bot.: The typical genus of the small order Gilliesiaceæ (q. v.).

gill-lîeg-I-a-çø-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. gilliesi (a) (q. v.), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -acæ.]

Bot.: Gilliesiads, an order of Exogæ, alliance Lilliales. It consists of small herbaceous plants with tunicated bulbs. The leaves are grassy; the flowers, which are inconspicuous, are umbellate, surrounded by bracts, the outer petaloid and herbaceous, the inner colored; perianth minute; stamens six, three sometimes sterile; ovary superior, three-lobed; style one, stigma simple; capsule three-lobed, three-valved, many-seeded. They are found in Chili. Lindley enumerated two genera, and estimated the known species at five.

gill-lîeg-I-a-çø, s. pl. [Mod. Latin gilliesi (a) (q. v.), and Eng. pl. suff. -acæ.]

Bot.: The English name given by Lindley to the order Gilliesia (q. v.).

gill-lîng-ite, s. [From Gillinge-Grube in Södermanland, Sweden, where it occurs.]

Min.: A black, amorphous, often compact mineral; its hardness 3, specific gravity, 3.04. Composition: Silica, 27.50 to 32.18; alumina, 0 to 5.50; sesquioxide of iron, 0 to 37.49; water, 11.75 to 20, &c. A variety of it is called Thraulite (q. v.). (Dana.)

gill-lý-flów-ër, gill-lí-flów-ër, jer-e-floure, gill-lo-fre, gill-lo-fr, gill-o-ver, gi-ro-fer, s. [Fr. giroflée, from Fr. & Prov. girofle=clove; Sp. girofle, girofre; Port. goivo; Ital. gerofano; Lat. caryophyllum, from Gr. karyophyton=the clove tree; karyon=a nut, and phyllon=a leaf.]

Botany:

1. Spec.: Matthiola incana, Stock, or more fully, Stock Gillyflower. [Stock.]

2. The genus Matthiola.

† Clove Gillyflower is Dianthus caryophyllus; Marsh Gillyflower, Lychnis flosculi; Queen's Rogue's or Winter Gillyflower, Hesperis matronalis; Sea Gillyflower, Armeria vulgaris; Wall Gillyflower and Yellow Gillyflower, Cheiranthus cheiri; Single Gillyflower, Dianthus plumarius; Turkey Gillyflower, Tagetes erecta; Water Gillyflower, Hottonia palustris; Winter Gillyflower, Cheiranthus cheiri or Hesperis matronalis; and Gillyflower-grass, the same as CARNATION-GRASS (q. v.).

gin (1), s. [Old Fr. genevre = juniper; Lat. juniperus, from the spirit being flavored with berries of the juniper.]

Comm.: A compounded spirit, prepared either by re-distilling plain spirit with juniper berries, coriander seeds, angelica root, &c., or by adding various essential oils to rectified spirit. The gin produced by distilling possesses a much more delicate flavor than that produced by mixing or compounding. The strength of gin varies from proof to 50 under proof.

"Ingenuity is exhausted in devising attractive titles for the different descriptions of gin."—Dickens: Sketches by Boz; Gin-shops.

gin-mill, s. A tipling house; a saloon.

gin-palace, s. A gayly decorated bar-room, usually in a low neighborhood; one in which spirits are the staple articles of consumption.

"If temperance societies could suggest an antidote against hunger or distress, or establish dispensaries for the gratuitous distribution of Lethe-water, gin-palaces would be numbered among the things that were."—Dickens: Sketches by Boz; Gin-shops.

gin-shop, s. A place where gin is sold; a gin-palace.

"Death, at unawares, might duck him Deeper than the grave, and quench
The gin-shop's light in hell's grim drench."

R. Browning: Christmas Eve, iii.

gin-sling, s. A cold drink, composed of gin, soda-water, lemon, and sugar.

gin (2), ginne (1), gyn (1), gynne (1), s. [A contraction of Fr. engin, from Lat. ingenium = a contrivance.] [ENGINE.]

*1. Ordinary Language:

1. A mechanical contrivance or engine; a machine.

"[They] granten to lend to the seid John Wastell sum parte of old scaffolding, tymbre, and the use of certayne stuff, and necessaries there, as gynnes, wels, cables, &c."

Walspole: Anecdotes, i.; App. Indenture, 4 Henry VIII.

2. An engine of torture.

"Typhæus ioyns were stretched on a gin,
Theseus condemned to endless slouth by law;
And fifty sisters water in leke vessels draw."

Spenser: F. Q., l. v. 35.

3. Mechanism; mechanical arrangement.

"Bid him descend, and trill another pin
(For therein lieth the effect of all the gins),
And he wol down descend, and don your will."

Chaucer: C. T., 10, 636.

II. Machinery:

1. A portable hoisting-machine whose frame is a tripod, one leg being movable so as to vary its angle of elevation, and thus determine the height of the apex; the other two legs preserve their relative distance, and form standards for the drum, round which the rope is wound by power applied to the handspikes. For heavy weights a fall and tackle is used; and for hoisting a bucket from a well or mine, simply a couple of pulleys to change the direction of motion of the rope. One pulley is suspended from the apex, and the other attached between the two permanent legs, so as to change the rope to a horizontal position, for the attachment of a draught horse.

2. A pump operated by windmill.

"No gins or machines could suffice to lay and keep them dry."—Ray: The Creation, ii.

3. A coal-hoisting machine; a whin.

A. As substantive:

1. Botany:

(1) Zingiber officinale, Common or Narrow-leaved Ginger. It has subsessile linear lanceolate smooth leaves, oblong spikes, acute bracts, and a three-lobed lip. It is a native of India, but is cultivated in most tropical countries.

(2) The genus Zingiber. There is a Broad-leaved Ginger, Zingiber zerumbet, also a native of India. It is used externally for cataplasms and fomentations, but is not eaten.

(3) Sedum acre, from its extreme pungency.

2. Comm.: The dry, wrinkled rhizomes of the ginger-plant. The pieces, or as they are called racces, are usually from two to four inches long, branched, flat, and of a pale buff color. Ginger is known in commerce under two forms, coated and uncoated or scraped, the latter having been deprived of its epidermis when in the green state, and sold as white ginger. The chief varieties imported into this country are Jamaica, Cochin, Bengal, Japan, and African.

The first three are scraped gingers, and of these Jamaica is the most esteemed owing to its color and flavor. Some kinds of ginger are simply coated with chalk to give them a whiter appearance. Ginger is an agreeable aromatic, and a valuable stomachic; but is more largely used as a condiment than as a medicine. Prepared ginger, so largely imported from China in jars, consists of the young rhizomes boiled in syrup. Ground ginger is frequently adulterated, the chief adulterants being sago flour, wheat flour, ground rice, and arrowroot. These are added, not only to increase the weight, but to whiten a dark-colored variety, which is then sold as a first-class ginger. All these substances can be readily detected by the microscope.

3. Pharm.: Ginger is the rhizome scraped and dried of Zingiber officinale, a native of East India; also grown in the West Indies. Ginger contains a volatile oil, starch, resinous matter, gum, woody fiber, &c. It is an aromatic stimulant and carminative, and is given in dyspepsia and with purgative medicines to prevent griping. It is used to prepare Syrupus zingiberis, Syrup of Ginger, and Tinctura zingiberis, Tincture of Ginger.

† Amada, or Mango Ginger, is Curcuma amada; Egyptian Ginger, Colocasia esculenta; Indian, or Wild Ginger, Asarum canadense; and Wood-ginger, an old book-name for Anemone ranunculoides.

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) In the same sense as II. 1.

(2) The language spoken by the gypsies.

2. Figuratively:

(1) A person of a dark complexion; used in contempt or reproach.

(2) A cunning or crafty person; a person of bad character; a sly person.

II. Technically:

1. Ethnol.: A nomad Eastern race, the members of which came to Europe by way of the Isthmus of Suez and Egypt. They were, therefore, assumed to be Egyptians, and are so called in the Elizabethan legislation against them, and in other places. As Egypt became better known to the English, it was found that the "Egyptians" were as much foreigners there as in England. It is now proved that they are from India, and apparently from that part of it adjacent to the river Indus, with the languages of some tribes inhabiting the banks of which their tongue best agrees. A tribe near the mouth of the Indus is called Tchingenes, which is almost exactly the same as Tchingenes, by which name these wanderers are known in Turkey and the Levant. They call themselves Sind, the name of the country through which the Indus flows in the lower part of its course. They are believed to have left their native country in dread of Timur Beg, better known as Timoor the Tartar, or Tamerlane, and first appeared in Paris, in the end of August, 1427.

2. Entom.: A moth, Hypogymna dispar, of the tribe Bombycina and the family Liparidae. The male is dark-brown, and the female grayish-white.

B. As adj.: Of or pertaining to a gipsy or gipsies; resembling a gipsy.

gipsy-moth, gypsy-moth, s.

Entom.: The same as GIPSY, A. II. 2 (q. v.).

gipsy-winch, s.

Mach.: A small winch, having a drum, ratchet, and pawl; it may be fastened to a post. The handle of the winch is attached by stirrups to a cap revolving on the axis. Two motions can be applied to the winch, the ordinary rotary method of working the handle, and a reciprocating motion, in which the handle is worked up and down like a pump-handle.

gîp-sý, gýp-sý, v. i. [GIPSY, s.] To picnic or camp out in the woods.

gîp-sý-ism, gýp-sý-ism, s. [Eng. gipsy; -ism.]

1. The habits, practices, acts, or arts of gypsies; cheating, deception.

2. The state or condition of a gipsy.

gîp-sý-like, gýp-sý-like, a. [Eng. gipsy, gypsy; -like.] Like a gipsy or gipsies; resembling gypsies.

gîp-sý-wört, gýp-sý-wört, s. [Eng. gipsy, gypsy, and -wort.]

Botany:

1. Lycopus europæus. It is a labiate plant, dense whorls of flowers, white, with purple dots; hairy within, and having two stamens and leaves deeply and irregularly pinnatifid or serrate. It is about two feet high, and grows in ditches and by river banks.

2. The genus Lycopus.

gî-raffe, *gî-râf-fa, s. [Fr. girafe; Sp. & Port. girafa; Ital. giraffa, from Arab. zurafa.]

1. Zool.: The Camelopard, Camelopardalis giraffa. It constitutes the type of the family Camelopardalidae (q. v.). It has an affinity to the camel; but its resemblance to the leopard, which is only in its color and spots, is an analogy and no more. It has two small frontal horns and one central horn. The neck is very long, but has only the normal number of cervical vertebrae. The tongue is long and prehensile, and is used for stripping leaves off trees. The forelegs are very long, making the animal stand 15 to 18 feet high. It lives in small herds, and gallops in a ludicrously clumsy manner. The animal is inoffensive when unmolested, but will try to kick its assailant if it is attacked. Its flesh is good; when old it becomes coarse; the hide makes excellent leather. It is found in Nubia, Abyssinia, and the Cape of Good Hope; probably also in every part of the intermediate region.

2. Palæont.: Species of giraffe have been found in Miocene strata in India, Greece, and France.

gî-râf-i-na, s. pl. [Eng., &c., giraffe(s), and Lat. pl. adj. suff. -ina.]

Zool.: A tribe of ruminant mammals, sometimes constituted for the reception of the family Camelopardalidae, with which it agrees in extent.

1. Ord. Lang.: A branching candle-holder or chandelier; a gasalier.

"Girandoles of silver and mother-of-pearl."—Lytton. (Latham.)

2. Pyrotech.: A kind of revolving firework; a revolving sun.

gîr-ant, a. [Lat. gyrans, pr. par. of gyro=to turn round in a circle.] Whirling, revolving.

"I wound in gîrant orbits, smooth and white."

E. B. Browning.

gîr-ar-dîn-i-a, s. [Named by Gaudichaud, in 1826, after S. Girardin.]

Bot.: A genus of Urticaceæ. Sir Joseph Hooker says that a kind of cloth, and also a sort of cordage, are made from fiber furnished by Girardinia heterophylla, common in Sikkim and other parts of the Himalayas. Thread is made in Southern India from the closely allied species G. leschenaultiana.

gîr-a-sôl, gîr-a-sôle, s. [Fr. girasol, from Lat. gyro=to turn, and sol=the sun.]

1. Min.: A variety of opal. It is bluish white, and is translucent, with reddish reflections in a bright light.

2. Bot.: A plant—Heliotropium europæum, more commonly called the Turnsole.

giraumont (as zhër-ô-môh), s. [Fr. giraumont, giraumont; remote etym. unknown.]

Botany:

1. A cucurbitaceous plant, Cucurbita pepo.

2. Another cucurbitaceous plant of unknown species, the seeds of which are said by Endlicher to destroy the tapeworm.

gîrd (1), gyrd*, s. [GIRD (1), v.]

2. A cooper.

II. Civ. Eng.: A principal beam, of wood or metal, spanning the distance from wall to wall, or pier to pier, and used to support a superstructure or superincumbent weight, as a floor, the pathway of a bridge, &c. Girders are often compound, the timbers being scarfed together and stayed by truss-work, or fished at the joint. The ends of the girder rest on the wall or pier to an extent varying according to the span: thus for a girder of ten feet span, the bearing at each end should be seven inches; for a twenty feet span, fourteen inches. The ends rest on templates. [TEMPLATE.] Girders are of various sorts, according to the purpose for which they are required. [BOWSTRING-GIRDER, BOX-GIRDER, LATTICE-GIRDER, TRUSS-GIRDER.] A sandwich-girder is one which is composed of two wooden beams with an iron flitch-plate between, all bolted together.

2. Hist.: The Girondist party.

Gîr-on-dist, Gîr-on-din, s. & a. [Fr. Girondin; Eng., &c., suff. -ist. See def.]

A. As substantive:

Hist.: The name of a great political party in France; one of the most powerful factors in at least the earlier part of the first French Revolution. When the Legislative Assembly met in A. D. 1791, it was found to contain representatives of all the three parties which naturally exist in every country—those of the upper, the middle, and the lower classes. The Girondists were the second of these—the party of the middle classes, and were republican in sentiment. They obtained their designation from the fact that their most celebrated leaders, Vergniaud, Guadet, Gensonné, &c., were members for the department of the Gironde, originally lawyers in the law court of Bordeaux. Their followers were the bourgeois class, the professionals, and the smaller agriculturists. In 1791 they were the most powerful party in the Assembly, and for a time shaped the policy of their country. When conservative Europe, in the interests of monarchy, threatened France with invasion, it was the Girondists who, in April, 1792, declared war, the Jacobins deprecating hostilities, as fearing the result. To overcome their monarchic rivals, the Girondists coquetted with the last-named party, and found that they had gained, not a servant, but a cruel and exacting master. The quarrel between the two arose after the massacres perpetrated in August and September, 1792, and the extreme revolutionists ultimately prevailing, an armed mob on May 31, 1793, assailed the Convention, and demanded the imprisonment of twenty-nine Girondist deputies. These were arrested on June 2, and twenty-one of them were guillotined on October 31. Others were subsequently put to death; a few escaping, reappeared in the Convention after the fall of Robespierre.

B. As adjective:

"Give none offense."—Corinthians x. 32.
15. To emit.
"Bitter notes my harp would give."
Tennyson: In Memoriam, cxxiv.
16. To communicate; as, to give an opinion.
17. To utter; to declare; as, to give a word of command.
"Thus having mourned, he gave the word around,
To raise the breathless body from the ground."
Dryden: Virgil's Æneid, xi. 69.
18. To set forth; to show.
"And thus I have given the history of Satire, and derived it from Ennius, to your lordship; that is, from its first rudiments of barbarity to its last polishing and perfection."—Dryden: Juvenal. (Dedic.)
19. To grant; to admit; to allow by way of supposition.
- *20. To consider; to reckon.
"The crown and comfort of my life, your favor,
I do give lost; for I do feel it gone."
Shakespeare: Winter's Tale, iii. 2.
21. To pledge; as, to give one's word or honor.
22. To pledge; to propose as a toast.
- *23. To represent.
"More cruel to your good report than grateful
To us that give you truly."
Shakespeare: Coriolanus, i. 9.
- *24. To ascribe; to impute.
"That might have mercy on the fault thou gavest him."
Shakespeare: Henry VIII, iii. 2.
25. To addict; to apply; to dispose. (Commonly in the past participle.)
"He that giveth his mind to the law of the most High, will seek out the wisdom of all the ancients."—Ecclesi. xxxix. 1.
- B. Reflexively:
1. To yield up; to resign.
"We never valued this poor seat of England;
And therefore, living hence, did give ourselves
To barbarous licence." Shakespeare: Henry V, i. 2.
2. To addict; to apply.
"They who gave themselves to warlike actions and enterprises, went immediately to the palace of Odin."—Temple.

1. To be generous; to give gifts.
"Give and it shall be given unto you."—Luke vi. 38.
2. To yield as to pressure.
- *3. To rush; to make an attack.
"Hannibal gave upon the Romans."—Hook: Roman History.
4. To begin to melt; to thaw; to grow soft.
"Some things are harder when they come from the fire, and afterwards give again, and grow soft; as the crust of bread, biscuit, sweetmeats, and salt."—Bacon: Natural History.
5. To begin to break; as, the weather gives.
- *6. To weep.
"Whose eyes do never give
But through lust and laughter."
Shakespeare: Timon of Athens, iv. 3.
- *7. To have a misgiving.
"My mind gives ye've reserved To rob poor market women."
J. Webster.
8. To lead; to open; to afford or form a passage or entrance.
"One green wicket in a privet hedge,
This yielding gave into a grassy walk."
Tennyson: Gardener's Daughter, 110.
- *1. To give away: To make over to another; to transfer; to alienate from one's self. Specif., to give in marriage.
"If you shall marry,
You give away this hand, and that is mine."
Shakespeare: All's Well That Ends Well, v. 3.
2. To give back:
(1) Trans.: To return, to restore.
"Their vices perhaps give back all those advantages which their victories procured."—Atterbury.
(2) Intrans.: To retire, to retreat; to go back.
"He cried out with a most vehement voice, I will walk in the strength of the Lord God. So they gave back and came no farther."—Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, pt. i.
3. To give forth: To publish, to tell.
"Soon after it was given forth, and believed by many, that the king was dead."—Hayward.
4. To give in:

(b) To give one's self to; to adopt; to embrace; to yield assent.
"This is a geography peculiar to the medallists; the poets, however, have sometimes given in to it, and furnish us with very good lights for the explication of it."—Addison: On Medals.
5. To give off:
(1) Transitive:
(a) To emit; to send out; as, to give off vapor.
(b) To resign; to give up.
"Is this Ascension day! did not the prophet Say, that before Ascension day at noon,
My crown I should give off?"
Shakespeare: King John, v. 1.
- (2) Intrans.: To cease, to forbear; to give over.
"The punishment would be kept from being too much, if we gave off as soon as we perceived that it reached the mind."—Locke: On Education.
- *6. To give on: To rush or fall on.
7. To give out:
(1) Transitive:
(a) To emit; to send out; as, A plant gives out a scent.
(b) To publish; to proclaim; to announce publicly.
"He gave out general summons for the assembly of his counsel for the war."—Knolles: History of the Turks.
(c) To issue; to send forth or out.
"The night was distinguished by the orders which he gave out to his army, that they should forbear all insulting of their enemies."—Addison.
(d) To distribute.
(e) To surrender; to give up.
"I thought ye would never have given out these arms."—Shakespeare: Henry VI, Pt. II, iv. 8.
(f) To show, to exhibit, to present.
"A better soldier none that Christendom gives out."
Shakespeare: Macbeth, iv. 3.
- (g) To represent, to pretend; to show or declare falsely.
"One that gives out himself Prince Florizel."
Shakespeare: Winter's Tale, v. 1.
- (2) Intransitive:
(a) To declare, to represent.
"Give out you are of Epidamnus."
Shakespeare: Comedy of Errors, i. 2.
(b) To give in; to cease from exertion; to yield, to give way.
"Madam, I always believed you so stout That for twenty denials you would not give out."
Swift: The Grand Question Debated.
(c) To proclaim, to declare; to announce publicly.
8. To give over:
(1) Transitive:
(a) To hand over; to transfer, to surrender.
(b) To cease; to give up; to leave off; to abandon.
"If Desdemona will return me my jewels, I will give over my suit, and repent my unlawful solicitation."—Shakespeare: Othello, iv. 2.
(c) To despair of; to give up all hopes of; to conclude lost.
"Since it is lawful to practice upon them that are forsaken and given over, I will venture to prescribe for you."—Suckling.
- (d) To addict or apply one's self.
"When the Babylonians had given themselves over to all manner of vice, it was time for the Lord, who had set up that empire, to pull it down."—Greiv.
- (2) Intrans.: To cease, to yield; to give in; to discontinue.
"Give not o'er so: to him again; entreat him."
Shakespeare: Measure for Measure, ii. 2.
9. To give up:
(1) Transitive:
(a) To surrender, to relinquish, to cede, to yield.
"He has betrayed your business, and given up For certain drops of salt your city Rome."
Shakespeare: Coriolanus, v. 6.
(b) To resign, to commit.
"Let us give ourselves wholly up to Christ in heart and desire."—Taylor: Holy Living.
(c) To abandon as lost or hopeless; to despair of.
"Have the physicians given up all their hopes?
Cannot they add a few days to a monarch's?"
Rowe: Ambitious Step-mother, i. 1.
- (d) To deliver up; to declare publicly.
"And Joab gave up the sum of the number of the people to the king."—2 Samuel xxiv. 3.
- (2) Intrans.: To give in; to yield; to despair of anything; to retire from a contest.
10. To give the bag, the sack to: To discharge from employment.
11. To give birth to:

(2) Fig.: To be the origin, source, or cause of.
12. To give chase to: To pursue.
13. To give ear: To listen; to give heed; to pay attention.
"The devil threatened to tear me in pieces if I once gave ear to divinity: and now 'tis too late."—Marlowe: Dr. Faustus, v. iii.
14. Give you good day, even, or morrow: An ellipsis for God give you good day, &c.
15. To give ground: To yield or give way under pressure of an advancing force.
16. To give it to one: To scold, or beat severely. (Colloquial.)
17. To give one the lie: To charge one with falsehood; to call one a liar.
18. To give head: To give full liberty to; as, one gives a horse his head.
19. To give heed: To pay attention; to listen; to give ear.
20. To give line: To give full liberty to; as, one would give a fish plenty of line.
21. To give tongue:
Hunt.: To bark.
22. To give one's self up:
(1) To surrender one's self.
(2) To resign or abandon one's self; to addict one's self.
(3) To despair of one's self; to conclude one's self to be lost.
23. To give way:
(1) Ordinary Language:
(a) To yield; to retire or retreat before pressure; to give ground.
(b) To fail, to break, to sink; as, The hedge gave way under the weight.
(c) To become depreciated in value.
"Spanish and Egyptian gave way a little."—London Daily Telegraph.
(2) Naut.: In the imperative. An order to a boat's crew to start rowing or to increase their exertions.
24. To give way together:
Naut.: To row in time, to keep stroke.
25. Give and take:
(1) As subst.: A fair exchange.
(2) As adj.: Fairly exchanged; equally or fairly divided.
"Had a bit the best of some smart give and take work."—London Field.
26. To give the hand:
(1) To espouse, to bestow in marriage.
* (2) To yield the supremacy or preëminence; to acknowledge one's self beaten by or inferior to another.
"Lessons being free from some inconveniences whereunto sermons are more subject, they may in this respect no less take than in others they must give the hand, which betokeneth preëminence."—Hooker: Ecclesiastical Polity.
- * (1) Crabb thus discriminates between to give, to grant, and to bestow: "The idea of communicating to another what is our own, or in our power, is common to these terms; this is the whole signification of give; but grant and bestow include accessory ideas in their meaning. To grant is to give at one's pleasure; to bestow is to give with a certain degree of necessity. Giving is confined to no object; whatever property we transfer into the hands of another, that we give; we give money, clothes, food, or whatever is transferable: granting is confined to such objects as afford pleasure or convenience. To give has no respect to the circumstances of the action or the agent; it is applicable to persons of all conditions: to grant bespeaks not only the will, but the power and influence of the granter; to bestow bespeaks the necessitous condition of the receiver."

(2) He thus discriminates between to give, to present, to offer, and to exhibit: "What is given is actually transferred: what is presented, that is, made a present to him; or offered, that is, brought in his way, is put in the way of being transferred: we present in giving, and offer in order to give; but it may be that we may give without presenting or offering; and on the other hand, we may present or offer without giving. To give is the familiar term which designates the ordinary transfer of property: to present is a term of respect; it includes in it the formality and ceremony of setting before another that which we wish to give: to offer is an act of humility or solemnity; it bespeaks the movement of the heart, which impels to the making a transfer or gift. To exhibit expresses, likewise, the idea of attracting notice also: that which is exhibited is more striking than what is presented or offered; thus a poem is said to exhibit marks of genius."

(3) He thus discriminates between to give up, to yield, to deliver, to surrender, to cede, and to concede: "We give up that which we wish to retain; we deliver that which we wish not to retain. Deliver does not include the idea of a transfer; but give up implies both the giving from, and the giving to: we give up our house to the accommodation of our friends; we deliver the property into the hands of the owner. Where the action is compulsory, we may either say an officer gives up or surrenders his sword; when the action is discretionary, we may either say he gives up or yields a point of discussion: give up has, however, an extensiveness of application, which gives it an office distinct from either surrender or yield. Cede is properly to surrender by virtue of a treaty: we may surrender a town as an act of necessity; but the cession of a country is purely a political transaction. To concede, which is but a variation of cede, is a mode of yielding which may be either an act of discretion or courtesy."

(4) He thus discriminates between to give up, to abandon, to resign, and to forego: "To give up and abandon both denote a positive decision of the mind; but the former may be the act of the understanding or the will, the latter is more commonly the act of the will and the passions: to give up is applied to familiar cases; abandon to matters of importance. To give up and resign are applied either to the outward actions, or merely to the inward movements: but the former is active, it determinately fixes the conduct; the latter seems to be rather passive: thus we give up expectations and resign hopes. Forego is comparable with resign, inasmuch as it expresses a passive action: we resign that which we have, and we forego that which we might have; we resign the claims which we have already made; we forego the claims which we might make." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

A. As pa. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As adjective:

1. Ordinary Language:

1. Bestowed, granted, conferred, imparted.

2. Admitted, supposed, granted, conceded.

3. Affected, devoted. (Followed by to.)

*4. Dictated, disposed, inclined.

II. Math.: A term applied to something which is supposed to be known: as with a given point as a center and a given radius a circle can be described; or when the ratio between two quantities is known they are said to be in a given ratio.

gĭv'-ĕr, gev-er, gyv-er, s. [Eng. giv(e); -er; Sw. gĭfvere; Dan. giver; Dut. gever; O. H. Ger. geber.] One who gives, bestows, or grants; a granter; an imparter or distributor.

gives, s. pl. [GIVES.]

gĭv'-ĭng, gev-ing, gyv-yng, pr. par., a. & s. [GIVE.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of bestowing, granting, or imparting; a bestowal; a grant.

gĭv-ing-out, s. An assertion; a declaration.

"The pronouncing of some doubtful phrase . . . Or such ambiguous giving-out, to note That you know aught of me."

Shakesp.: Hamlet, i. 5.

gĭz'-zard, gis-er, giz-i-er, s. [O. Fr. gezier; Fr. gĕsier, from Lat. gigeria=the entrails of fowls.]

1. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: In the same sense as II.

2. Fig.: The temper or disposition.

"Satisfaction and restitution lie so cursedly hard upon the gizzards of our publicans."—L'Estrange.

II. Technically:

1. Ornith.: A muscular division of the stomach in birds; it is an elongated sac in the body of birds just below the liver, and having two openings above, the one into the duodenum and the other into the proventriculus. The gizzard of the raptorial bird is thin and feeble, while that of the gaminivorous bird is strong, with thick and muscular walls, the whole lined with a thick horny epithelium.

"The gizzard is not only made very strong, especially in the granivorous, but hath also a faculty of grinding what is therein."—Derham: Physico-Theology, bk. vii., ch. ii. (Note.)

2. Entom.: The proventriculus or second muscular stomach designed for crushing food. It often has the walls armed with plates or teeth of chitine.

3. Zool.: A stomach paved with calcareous plates in the family of mollusks called Bullidæ. It is large and strong enough to crush the small shell-fish, which are swallowed entire. A gizzard exists also in Aplysia, which is a vegetable feeder. (S. P. Woodward.)

glā-bĕl'-lā, s. [Latin glabellus, fem. glabella=without hair, smooth.]

Anatomy:

1. Human: The surface between the superciliary ridges.

2. (Compar.) The frontal portion of a trilobite.

glā-bĕr, a. [Lat.] Smooth, slippery.

glā-brāte, a. [Lat. glabratus, pa. par. of glabro=to make bald, to deprive of hair, from glaber (fem. glabra)=without hair, smooth.]

Bot.: Becoming glabrous or smooth from age. (Gray.)

glā-brī-āte, glā-brĕ-āte, v. t. [Lat. glabratus, pa. par. of glabro, from glaber=without hair, smooth.] To make smooth, bare, or bald.

glā-brī-tĭ, s. [Lat. glabritas, from glaber=without hair, smooth.] The state of being glabrous, smooth, or bald.

glā-brōus, a. [Lat. glaber.]

Bot.: Smooth; having a surface devoid of hair or pubescence.

"French elm, whose leaves are thicker and more florid, glabrous, or smooth."—Evelyn: Sylvia.

glā-ĉī-a-ble (or ĉī as shī), a. [Lat. glaci(es)=ice, and Eng. suff. -able.] Capable of being converted into ice.

"Sensible philosophers conceive of the generation of diamonds, iris, beryls; not making them of frozen icicle, or from meer aqueous and glaciabie substances."—Broune: Vulgar Errors, bk. ii., ch. i.

glā-ĉī-al (or ĉī as shī), a. [Fr. & Sp. glacial; Port. glacial; Ital. glaciale, from Lat. glacialis=icy, frozen, full of ice; glacies=ice.] Of or belonging to ice.

"And for his glacial air, where is the shepherd so simple, but could have told him, that snowy or whatever else he means by glacial air, or clouds may serve to darken the day, but not at all prolong it?"—Grew: Cosmologia Sacra, bk. iv., ch. iv.

glacial acetic-acid, s.

Chem.: A name given to concentrated acetic acid, containing 84 per cent. of CH_3COOH . It is so called because it forms a colorless crystalline mass like ice when it is cooled to 34° F., and it remains crystalline till the temperature rises to 48° F. Its specific gravity is 1.065. It is used externally as a caustic irritant, vesicant, and escharotic.

glacial-drift, s.

Geol.: Drift, that is transported material, in the carrying or deposition of which ice, in the form either of land ice or of icebergs, took the leading part. The smoother surfaces of the bowlders and pebbles generally exhibit a series of scratches, parallel to each other if made contemporaneously, though, if arising at different periods, a newer set of scratches may cross an older one. The fossil remains are those of more or less arctic mollusks and other animals. It is the same as Boulder-drift (q. v.). [GLACIAL-FORMATIONS, GLACIAL-PERIOD.]

glacial-epoch, s. [GLACIAL-PERIOD.]

glacial-formations, s. pl.

Geol.: A more comprehensive term than glacial-drift (q. v.).

glacial-period, glacial-epoch, s.

Geol.: A period or epoch during which ice largely prevailed, the climate, in what are now temperate latitudes, being polar. It lasted long, commencing during the Newer Pliocene, and terminating before the close of the Post-Pliocene. Arctic conditions did not prevail uninterruptedly during all this time. Two distinct divisions of the glacial-period or distinct glacial-periods are traceable in the Alps, the earlier one the more severe of the two. During the warmer interval, called by Professor Heer the Inter-glacial Period, dense beds of lignite were deposited at Dürnten and other places near Zurich. It was during the glacial-period that the Alpine plants, now found on the summit of European mountains, passed southward from the Arctic regions. During the later of the two glacial periods man existed; whether he did so during the earlier one is a matter of dispute. What caused the abnormal cold has not been settled. It may, as Sir Charles Lyell thinks, have been great expanses of high land near the North Pole. Sir John Herschel in 1832, M. Adhémar in 1840, and notably Mr. Croll in 1864, suggested astronomical causes which may have had an effect in bringing on the glacial epochs. The chief is the varying eccentricity of the earth's orbit. In A. D. 1800 this was .0168, but 200,000 years previously it was .0567, making a difference of 104 millions of miles, and an excess of winter days amounting to 277. So also 210,000 years before A. D. 1800, the eccentricity was .0575, the difference in millions of miles, 104, and the winter days in excess 27.8. If the glacial-period was thus produced, this may have been its date. The difference was 104 millions of miles against 750,000 years, and 13½ millions 850,000 years before A. D. 1800. That no glacial strata had been found earlier than those in the Newer Pliocene militates against the view that the cold of that time was produced by periodically recurrent astronomical causes.

Chemical: $\text{H}_2\text{O} \cdot \text{P}_2\text{O}_5 = \text{HPO}_3$. It is exceedingly deliquescent, and requires to be kept in a closely-stopped bottle. It is called also metaphosphoric-acid.

glacial-theory, glacial-hypothesis, s.

Geology:

1. An hypothesis or a theory now universally accepted, which attributes the drift mainly to the action of ice.

2. An hypothesis or theory as to the descent of glaciers. [GLACIER.]

glā-ĉī-al-ist (or ĉī as shī), s. [English glacial; -ist.]

A. As subst.: One who attributes the phenomena of the drift to the action of ice. Nearly all geologists are now glacialists.

B. As adj.: Of or belonging to the school of geologists described under A., or their tenets; as, glacialist views.

glā-ĉī-al-ly (or ĉī as shī), adv. [Eng. glacial; -ly.] By means of ice.

"Far-transported rocks, glacially polished and scratched on more than one side."—Lyell: Student's Elements of Geology, ch. xii.

glā-ĉī-ār'-ī-ūm (or ĉī as shī), s. [Lat. glaci(es)=ice; neut. suff. -arium.] A room or inclosed space with a level flooring of artificial ice for skating on.

glā-ĉī-āte (or ĉī as shī), v. t. & i. [Lat. glaciatus, pa. par. of glacio=to make or turn into ice, to congeal; glacies=ice.]

A. Transitive:

1. To convert into ice.

2. To act upon by means of ice.

"The probable date of the introduction of the contents into ossiferous caves in glaciated areas may be ascertained by an examination of the new deposits."—Dawkins: Cave Hunting, ch. xi.

B. Intrans.: To become ice. (Johnson.)

"First a glaciating degree of cold, and then the highest we could produce by art."—Boyle: Works, ii. 622.

glā-ĉī-ā-tion (or ĉī as shī), s. [Fr. glaciation.]

1. Ord. Lang.: The act of congealing; the state of being congealed.

2. Geol.: The state of being acted upon by ice; ice-action. Used of a country or district, a stratum, or a bowlder. It consists chiefly of polished and furrowed rock-surfaces, of moraines, and erratic blocks.

"Beneath the drifts were unequivocal marks of prolonged glaciation."—Lyell: Student's Elements of Geology, ch. xii.

glāĉ'-ī-ĕr, s. [Fr., from Lat. glacies=ice.]

A. As substantive:

Physic. Geol., &c.: A river of ice slowly descending a mountain side. A glacier commences primarily as a frozen mass of snow, formed above the line of perpetual congelation, and consolidated partly by pressure and partly by the freezing of water infiltrated into it from its surface. In the Swiss Alps the glaciers are between twenty and thirty miles long, their greatest breadth two or three miles, and their depth more than 600 feet. Why the glacier descends has been a very disputed question. Saussure attributed it to its weight, aided by the water beneath it. Charpentier and Agassiz to dilatation produced by the freezing of water in the interstices, a view which Hopkins opposed on mathematical and mechanical grounds. Agassiz and Prof. James Forbes discovered that the glacier, like an ordinary river, moved faster on the surface than below, and in the middle than at the sides. Forbes therefore believed that viscosity was the cause of the glacier's action. Tyndall attributed it chiefly to regelation, that is, to parts of it melting and freezing again. When, in descending a mountain-side, the glacier has to force its way through a narrow channel, the brittle ice is crushed and broken, but by virtue of "regelation" it freezes anew when it has cleared the obstruction. Prof. Tyndall has imitated the whole process artificially on a small scale, and his is now the accepted explanation of glacier-movement. As a glacier descends, it carries with it stones, which, on its melting, are deposited in a moraine (q. v.). By these moving beneath it, and projecting from it, the subjacent rocks are polished and scored with parallel furrows. It makes also a dome-shaped mass of smoother rock, called in Switzerland roches moutonnées (q. v.). It scoops out lakes. [GLACIER-LAKE.] If it reach the sea, and descend into it, huge masses of it float off as icebergs.

"The glacier's cold and restless mass Moves onward day by day."

Byron: Manfred, i. 1.

B. As adj.: Of, belonging to, produced by, or derived from a glacier.

glacier-dam, s.

Phys. Geog. & Geol.: A dam across a river produced by a glacier obstructing the passage of the waters.

"This old level is determined, not by the height of the glacier-dam."—Lyell: Princip. Geol. (11th ed.), ch. xvi.

Phys. Geog. & Geol.: Erosion by means of glaciers. There is a glacier-erosion theory of lake basins. [LAKE.] (Quar. Jour. Geol. Soc., xviii. 185; xxx. 479.)

glacier-fork, s.

Phys. Geog. & Geol.: A fork-like appearance produced by the junction of two glaciers which, after uniting, flow on together. At the point of junction they make cross grooves upon any flat surface over which they pass. This may be seen in Norway and elsewhere.

glacier-lake, s.

Phys. Geog. & Geol.: A lake produced temporarily or permanently by a glacier. It is noteworthy that glacier-lands like Switzerland are also lands abounding in lakes.

glacier-moraine, s.

Phys. Geog. & Geol.: A moraine deposited by a retreating or departed glacier.

glacier-mud, s.

Geol.: Boulder earth. An unstratified mass of coarse, gritty mud, with pebbles, boulders, and stony particles on the surface of ice-worn rocks.

glacier-valley, s.

Phys. Geog. & Geol.: A valley, the essential factor in the formation of which has been a glacier. (Quar. Jour. Geol. Soc., xx. 454.)

glâ-gl-ère, s. [Fr.]

Geol.: A cavern full of ice existing in a mountain land.

"We walked quickly away from the glacières, agreeing that it was not improbable that in that part of the Jura there might be many hidden caves, containing more or less ice."—G. F. Browne: Ice Caves, ch. iv.

glâ-gl-ô- (or gl as sh), a. in comp. [Lat. glacies = ice.] Pertaining to ice, as glacio-aqueous = pertaining to the combined action of ice and water.

glâ-gl-ous (or gl as sh), a. [Lat. glaci(es) = ice, and Eng., &c., suff. -ous.] Like ice; icy.

"Although exhaled and placed in cold conservatories, it will crystallize and shoot into glaucous bodies."—Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. ii., ch. i.

glâ-gl-s, s. [Fr., from glace; Lat. glacies = ice.] 1. Fort.: The superior slope of the rampart of the covered way, or, where the rampart does not exist, the declivity immediately in front of the ditch of a work, forming a gentle slope toward the country, and protecting the revêtement of the escarp from the fire of an enemy.

2. Geol.: A gentle slope, not so steep as a talus. glâd, *gladde, *glade, *glead, *gleade, *gled, a. & s. [A. S. glæd = shining, bright, glad; cogn. with Dut. glad = bright, smooth, sleek; Icel. gladhr = bright; Dan. & Sw. glad = joyful, joyous; Ger. glatt = smooth, even; O. Fris. glæd = smooth. From the same root as glide and glow.] [GLADE.]

fâte, fât, färe, amidst, whât, fâll, father; wê, wêt, hère, camêl, hêr, thêre; pine, pît, sire, sîr, marine; gô, pôl, or, wôre, wôi, wôrk, whô, sôn; mâte, cûb, cûre, unite, cûr, rûle, fûll; trÿ, Sÿrian. æ, œ = ê; ey = â. qu = kw.

A. As adjective:

1. Pleased; cheerful; gratified; feeling pleasure, joy, or satisfaction.

"I am right glad that he's so out of hope."
Shakesp.: Tempest, iii. 3.

"It is followed by at, or of, and formerly also by with before that which causes the pleasure or satisfaction.

"He glad
Of her attention, gained with serpent tongue,
His fraudulent temptation thus begun."
Milton: P. L., ix. 581.

2. Expressive of or indicating pleasure or satisfaction; cheerful, joyful; as, a glad countenance.

"Ev'n adverse navies blessed the binding gale, Kept down the glad acclaim, and silent joyed."
Thomson: Liberty, iv. 1, 127.

3. Causing or affording pleasure, joy, or satisfaction; gladdening; joyful.

"I am sent to speak unto thee, and to show thee these glad tidings."—Luke i. 19.

4. Wearing a gay or bright appearance; cheerful; bright; showy; gay.

"The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them, and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose."—Isaiah xxxv. 1.

5. It is used colloquially in a somewhat sarcastic sense.

"I would be glad to learn from those who pronounce that the human soul always thinks, how they know it."—Locke.

B. As subst.: Gladness, joy, pleasure.

"Till fortune, tired with doing bad, Threw him ashore, to give him glad."
Shakesp.: Pericles, ii. (Pro.)

Crabb thus discriminates between glad, pleased, joyful, and cheerful: "Glad and pleased are both applied to the ordinary occurrences of the day; but the former denotes rather a lively and momentary sentiment, the latter a gentle but rather a more lasting feeling; we are glad to see a friend who has been long absent; we are pleased with the company of an intelligent and communicative person. Glad, joyful, and cheerful, all express more or less lively sentiments; but glad is less vivid than joyful, and more so than cheerful. Glad is seldom employed as an epithet to qualify things, except in the scriptural or solemn style; glad tidings of great joy; joyful is seldom used to qualify persons than things; we either speak of a cheerful disposition, a cheerful person, a cheerful society, or a cheerful face, a cheerful sound, a cheerful aspect, and the like." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) glad-eye, s.

Ornith.: One of the names given to the Yellow Ammer, or Yellowhammer (Emberiza citrinella).

glad-warbling, a. Singing or warbling joyfully.

A. Trans.: To make glad or joyful; to gladden, to rejoice.

"There is none that so much comforteth and gladdeth the hearer, as a thing spoken contrary to the expectation of other."—Wilson: Arte of Rhetorique, p. 155.

B. Intrans.: To become or be glad; to rejoice.

"Advance, immortal bard, come up and view
The gladdening face of that great king."
Ben Jonson: Irish Masque.

glâd-dên, v. t. & i. [Eng. glad, a.; -en.]

A. Trans.: To make glad, pleased, or joyful; to rejoice, to cheer.

"Thou earliest minister of the Almighty
Which gladdened, on the mountain tops, the hearts Of the Chaldean shepherds."
Byron: Manfred, iii. 2.

B. Intrans.: To become or be glad; to rejoice.

"So shall your company ever gladden at the sound of your voice."—Adams.

glâd-dêr, *glâd-er, s. [Eng. glad; -er.] One who or that which gladdens or makes glad.

"Daughter of Jove, and spouse of Vulcanus, Thou gladder of the mount of Cithæron."
Chaucer: C. T., 2, 225.

glâde (1), s. [Of uncertain origin, but probably closely connected with Eng. glad, and Icel. gladhr, the original meaning being an opening for light; cf. Nor. glætte = a clear spot among clouds; glætte = to peep; glætt = an opening.]

1. An opening or passage through a wood; an open space in a wood or forest.

"True, I must leave sweet Rokeby's glades,
Nor wander more in Gretna's shades;
But sure, no rigid jailer, thou Wilt a short prison-walk allow."
Scott: Rokeby, v. 12.

2. A part left unfrozen in rivers; an opening in the ice of rivers.

3. An overglade.

glade-net, s. A kind of net used for catching birds in the openings of forests.

Bot.: A name given to several species of the Iris family, especially Iris foetidissima, from the sword-like shape of the leaves.

glâd-fûl, *glâd-fûll, *glâd-ful, a. [English glad; ful(l).] Full of gladness or joy; joyful.

"The publique comforte and gladfull reioycing whiche at her byrth she brought to all Englande."—Udall: Dedic. Epist. to G. Katherine.

glâd-fûl-nêss, s. [Eng. gladful; -ness.] The quality or state of being glad; gladness, joy.

"And there him rests in riotous suffiance
Of all his gladfulness and kingly joyance."
Spenser: Muipoemoloe, 206.

glâd-l-î-âte, s. [Lat. gladius = a sword.] Sword-shaped; resembling a sword in shape; ensiform.

glâd-l-î-â-tôr, s. [Lat. = A swordsman, a fighter in the public games, a gladiator, from gladius = a sword.]

1. Literally:

Rom. Antiq.: One of a class of men whose profession was to fight in public for the entertainment of the people.

They were armed with deadly weapons, and usually fought in pairs. The numbers of these men were principally recruited from prisoners of war, or refractory slaves sold by their masters to the lanista (or trainer). Malefactors also were occasionally forced into fighting as gladiators, and occasionally Roman citizens offered themselves voluntarily for hire, and to such the specific term actoratus was applied, their pay being called actoramentum. Under the more worthless and dissolute emperors, equites, priests, and senators did not scruple to contend in the arena, in the hope of attracting the attention and gaining the favor of the prince; and even high-born women were found who consented to pander to the appetite for novelty, by fighting with each other or with dwarfs. Gladiators were divided into classes according to the manner in which they were equipped, and were in many cases named from the nation whose characteristic arms they bore. The representatives of different nations were frequently matched against each other, and the comparative efficiency of their weapons, offensive and defensive, was thus put to the test. The classes most frequently mentioned are—the Thracians, armed with a light circular buckler and short crooked cutlass; the Mirmillones, equipped as Gaulish warriors, with an oblong shield, curved to match the shape of the body. The Retiarii were armed with a net (rete) and a kind of three-pointed spear or trident with a long handle, but were destitute of defensive armor; they were usually paired with a heavy-armed opponent, a mirmillo for example, who was in this case designated secutor (from Lat. sequor = to follow); the retiarius, being no match for his antagonist in a hand-to-hand fight, endeavored, as the latter approached, to throw his net so as to entangle him in its meshes, and, if successful, stabbed him with the trident before he could extricate himself. If the cast failed he was compelled to take to flight, was chased by the secutor (and hence the name), and if overtaken easily dispatched. If, however, the retiarius contrived to evade his pursuer until he was prepared for a second throw, then the contest was renewed as at first, and continued until one or the other was baffled or exhausted. If one of the combatants was wounded so as to be unable to continue the fight, the life or death of the wounded man, who held up his finger in token of submission, depended upon the pleasure of the president, who usually, as a matter of courtesy, referred it to the spectators, who signified their decision by raising or depressing their thumbs, accordingly as they wished him to be killed or saved. There were regular academies devoted to the instruction of these prize-fighters, in which novices were taught the principles of their art by fighting with heavy wooden swords. Originally, gladiatorial contests were fought at the funerals of distinguished persons, but in time they came to form a part of every important public solemnity or festival, and were even introduced occasionally at private banquets.

"Of raging aspect, rushed impetuous forth
The gladiator." Thomson: Liberty, iv. 153.

gländ, s. [Fr. glande, from Lat. glans, (genit. gländis)=a nut-like fruit, as an acorn, a beechnut, a chestnut, &c.]

1. Anat.: A term at first vaguely applied to any smooth, round viscus, but which is now limited to such of the seas secreta-t. e., separate by a process of cell-growth, certain constituents of the blood which are afterward poured out from the gland by means of a duct. While yet the term glands was vaguely used, Sylvius divided them into conglomerate and conglomerate glands. To these Malpighi added the follicular or simple glands found in the fauces and behind the ears. They are now divided into secreting and lymphatic glands (q. v.).

"The glands, which o'er the body spread,
The rapid motion of the blood obstruct."
Blackmore: Creation.

2. Bot. (pl.): Cells or aggregations of cells distinguished from those in their neighborhood by containing resinous, oily, sugary, or fragrant substances. The walls of the cells generally become degenerated, and are ultimately dissolved, a cavity being thus formed as seen in the rind of the orange and lemon. In other cases the secretion is discharged externally. Ordinary glands occur in almost all the tissues of plants. Nectaries or honey-secreting glands of flowers are superficial, and are met with on all parts of the flower and receptacle. Mirbel divides glands into vascular glands, in which there are cells and vessels united, and cellular glands, which consist of cellular tissue alone. Glands may be simple, compound, internal, lenticular, sessile, or stalked, &c.

3. Found.: A hooked bar by which the parts of a molder's flask are clamped together.

4. Machinery:

(1) A contrivance consisting of a crosspiece or clutch for engaging or disengaging machinery moved by belts or bands.

(2) A plate through which the ends of a band or tightening clevis pass; a clip-plate.

5. Steam Engin.: The cover of a stuffing-box.

† (1) Ductless or Vascular Glands:

Anat.: Certain bodies resembling glands in form, but not possessing ducts for secretion, so that their products must be conveyed to them by lymphatic or sanguiferous vessels. Examples, the spleen, the thyroid body, the thymus gland, the suprarenal capsules, the pituitary body, the follicular glands at the root of the tongue and the lymphatic glands. (Quain.)

(2) Follicular or Simple Glands:

Anat.: [GLAND, 1.]

(3) Lymphatic Glands:

Anat.: [LYMPHATIC.]

(4) Secreting Glands:

Anat.: The typical kind of glands to which the name is now very frequently restricted. They collect and discharge at particular parts various matters derived from the organism, that these may be further employed for special purposes in the economy, or simply eliminated as redundant material or waste products. In the latter case the term used is excretion. In this process the nucleated cell takes a prominent part. When there is a simple recess formed of secreting membrane, the gland is said to be simple. Examples of this structure occur in the mucous membrane of the stomach, the intestines, &c. When the cavity is subdivided as well as extended with the view of increasing the secreting surface, the gland is said to be compound. The latter are again subdivided into first tubular and second acinar or racemose glands. The glands of the testicle and those of the kidney are tubular; the salivary, lachrymal, and mammary glands, and most of the glands opening into the mouth, the fauces, and the windpipe are racemose glands. They and some others constituted the conglomerate glands of Sylvius. [GLAND.] (Quain.)

(5) Simple Glands: [† (2); see also GLAND, Nos. 1 and 2.]

(6) Vascular Glands: [† (1).]

gländ-age* (age as låg), s. [O. Fr., from Lat. glans=an acorn.] The act of feeding on acorns; the season when swine are turned into the woods to eat the mast; mastage.

gländ-ër, v. t. [GLANDERS.] To affect or infect with glanders (q. v.).

gländ-ëred, a. [Eng. glander; -ed.] Affected with or suffering from glanders.

gländ-ër-ous*, a. [Eng. glander; -ous.] Glandered.

gländ-ërg, s. [GLAND.]

1. Farr.: A very dangerous and contagious disease in horses, attended with a running of corrupt matter from the nostrils, and enlargement and induration of the glands of the lower jaw.

"His horse is possessed with the glanders."

Shakesp.: Taming of the Shrew, iii. 2.

2. Pathol.: A corresponding disease communicated to man by contact with glandered animals. It is often fatal.

gländ-if-ër-ous, a. [Lat. glans (genit. glandis) [GLANS]; fero=to bear, and Eng. &c., suff. -ous.] Bot.: Bearing acorns or other nut-like fruits.

"The beech is of two sorts, and numbered amongst the glandiferous trees."—Mortimer: Husbandry.

gländ-i-form, a. [Lat. glans (genit. glandis) [GLANS], and forma=form, shape.] Bot.: Having the form of an acorn or other nut.

gländ-i-na, s. [Lat. glans (genit. glandis), and fem. sing. suff. -ina.]

Zool.: A sub-genus of Achatina, with an oblong fusiform shell, having the aperture narrow and elliptical. Found in West Indies, Central America, &c. Known species, 186. Fossil from the Eocene onward.

gländ-du-lä, s. [GLANDULE.]

gländ-du-lär, a. [Mod. Lat. glandul(a); and Eng. &c., suff. -ar.]

Anat., Bot., &c.: Characterized by the presence of a gland or glands. (Used in botany specially of a plant covered with hairs bearing glands upon their tips.)

"Germ awled; pointed, furrowed, with prominent seedlets, sitting on a glandular pedicel."—Sir W. Jones: On Select Indian Plants.

glandular-hairs, s. pl.

Bot.: Hairs possessing glands of any kind, and wherever situated. DeCandolle divided them into glandiferous hairs, in which the gland was formed at the summit of the hair, and excretory glandular hairs, in which it was at the base.

glandular-tissue, glandular woody-fiber, s.

1. Bot.: Tissue or woody fiber marked by rows of glands, ducts, or regular punctuations, having a central pore surrounded by a discoidal area, these rows of dots being placed in series, and parallel with the medullary rays. They exist chiefly in the Coniferae, but also in the Winteraceae.

2. Palaeobot.: When the glands described under No. 1 were found, as they often were, beautifully conspicuous in fossil wood, it was often assumed to be coniferous; but, as Mohl pointed out, these dots are not confined to Coniferae. Still the probability of evidence is in the favor of the ordinary identifications, and most of the fossil wood in the palaeozoic and secondary formations has the glands arranged alternately, as in the modern Araucaria.

gländ-u-lär-lý, adv. [Eng. glandular, -ly.]

Bot., &c.: In a glandular manner; having glands; as, glandularly-crenated, glandularly-serrated, glandularly-mucated, and glandularly-toothed. (Paxton.) gländ-u-lä-tion, s. [Eng. glandul(e); -ation.]

Bot.: The arrangement and structure of the glands in certain plants.

gländ-ule, gländ-du-lä (pl. gländ-du-læ), s.

Anat. &c.: A little gland. In Anatomy there are glandulae ceruminosae, a glandula lacrymalis, &c.; in Botany, glandulae hypogynae, hypogynous glandules, &c.

"Nature hath provided several glandules to separate this juice from the blood."—Ray: On the Creation, pt. ii.

gländ-u-lif-ër-ous, a. [Lat. glandul(a) (q. v.); fero=to bear, and Eng. &c., suff. -ous.] Bearing many glandules, or simply bearing glandules.

gländ-u-löse, a. [Latin glandulosus=full of kernels, glandulous.] The same as GLANDULOUS (q. v.).

gländ-u-lös-i-tý*, s. [Eng. glandulos(e); -ity.]

1. The state of being glandulose.

2. A glandule.

"In the upper part of worms are found certain white and oval glandulosityes."—Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. iii., ch. vii.

gländ-du-lö-šo, pref. [Lat. glandulosus.]

Bot., &c.: Glandulose, glandulous.

glanduloso-serrate, s.

Bot.: Having serratures lipped by glands.

gländ-u-loūs, a. [Latin glandulosus=full of kernels.]

1. Full of or abounding in glands; or simply provided with glands, containing glands.

"All glands and glandulous parts do likewise consist of fibers, but of the softer kind."—Grew: Cosmologia Sacra, bk. i., ch. v., § 18.

2. Pertaining to glands.

3. Resembling glands.

gläns, s. [Lat.=the nut-like fruit of some forest trees; an acorn, a beechnut, a chestnut, &c.]

1. Bot.: A fruit sometimes, though rarely, called in English a gland, placed by Lindley in his class called Syncarpi, and the section of it with inferior fruit. It is hard, indehiscent, dry, one-celled, with one or few seeds. It is developed from an ovary having several cells and several seeds, all of which are abortive except one or two. It is situated within the kind of persistent involucre called a cupule. The pericarp is crowned with the remains of the calyx teeth, but being minute they easily escape observation. Sometimes the glans is solitary, as in the oak; at others there are more than one of them in the cupule, as in the sweet chestnut and the beech. (Lindley.)

2. Anat.: Any structure of somewhat similar form.

"The integument adheres . . . to the spongy tissue of the glans."—Quain: Anatomy, i. 431.

glä-phyr-i-a (yr as ir), s. [Greek glaphyria=smoothness, polish; glaphyros=hollow, hollowed; glaphō=to hew, to carve.]

Bot.: A genus of Myrtleblooms, tribe Myrtæe. Glaphyria nitida is called by the Malays the tree of long life, from ascending on the hillside higher than any other tree. The natives of Bencoolen call it the tea-plant, and use it as a substitute for tea. (Lindley.)

gläre* (1), s. [GLAIRE.]

gläre (2), s. [GLARE, v.]

1. An overpowering luster or light; any dazzling splendor or brightness.

"[One] visual nerve shrinks from a painful glare

Of overpowering light."

Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. vi.

2. A fierce, piercing look or stare.

"About them round
A lion now he stalks with fiery glare."

Milton: P. L., iv. 402.

gläre, glär-yn*, glöre*, v. i. & t. [Etym. doubtful, but probably an English word; cf. A. S. glær=a transparent substance, amber; cogn. with Dut. glören=to glimmer; Icel. glóra=to gleam, to glare; M. H. Ger. glosen=to shine, to glow. Closely related to glass. (Skeat.)]

1. Intransitive:

1. To shine with a dazzling or overpowering light, luster, or brightness.

"Strong perfumes and glaring light

Oft destroy both smell and sight."

Carew: To my Cousin.

2. To look with fierce, piercing eyes; to stare wildly or fiercely.

"The lion and fierce tiger glared aloof."

Milton: P. R., i. 313.

3. To have a dazzling effect; to shine with excessive brightness; to displease or offend by gaudiness or overcoloring. [GLARING.]

"He maintains majesty in the midst of plainness; he shines but glares not."—Dryden.

B. Trans.*: To shoot or dart out in fierce flashes.

"One spirit in them ruled, and every eye Glared lightning."

Milton: P. R., vi. 849.

† For the difference between to glare and to shine, see SHINE.

glär-ë-lä, s. [Dimin. of Gr. glaros, laros=a ravenous sea-bird, perhaps the cormorant (?); Fr. glaréole.]

Ornith.: The typical genus of the sub-family Glareoline (q. v.). Glareola pratincola is the Pratincole (q. v.).

glär-ë-lä-næ, s. pl. [Mod. Latin glareol(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -ina.]

Ornith.: A sub-family of Charadriidae. The bill is short, much compressed, arched, and deeply cleft. The wings are long and narrow, the tail usually forked. The toes four, the middle toe and claw very long, the hinder one elevated, but touching the ground.

glär-ë-öse, a. [Lat. glareosus=full of gravel, gravelly; glarea=gravel.]

Bot.: Growing in gravelly soil or places.

glär-ë-ous, a. [GLAIROUS.]

glär-i-næss*, s. [Eng. glary; -ness.] The quality or state of being glary; glaringness.

"Bright crystal glass is glary; and to avoid that glariness, our artificers run into the other extreme."—Boyle: Works, vol. vi., p. 135.

glär-läng, pr. par., a. & s. [GLARE, v.]

A. As pr. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As adjective:

I. Literally:

1. Shining with a dazzling or overpowering brightness or luster; staring or looking fiercely.

2. Displeasing or offending the taste by gaudiness or ostentatious colors; to be too conspicuous or overcolored.

"The most glaring and notorious passages are none of the finest."—Felton: On the Classics.

II. Fig.: Notorious, barefaced, infamous; as, a glaring falsehood.

† Crabb thus discriminates between glaring and barefaced: "Glaring designates the thing; barefaced characterizes the person; a glaring falsehood is that which strikes the observer in an instant to be falsehood; a barefaced lie or falsehood betrays the effrontery of him who utters it. A glaring absurdity will be seen instantly without the aid of reflection; a barefaced piece of impudence characterizes the agent as more than ordinarily lost to all sense of decorum." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

glär-läng-lý, adv. [Eng. glaring; -ly.]

1. In a manner so as to offend the taste by overcoloring or by being too conspicuous.

"Yet there we ne'er condemn such hostile hues

As cut the parts or glaringly confuse."

Mason: Dufrenoy: Art of Painting.

2. In a barefaced, notorious, or shameless manner; barefacedly, openly.

"Mr. Hobbes has been reputed the first or principal man . . . that openly and glaringly espoused them."—Waterland: Works, viii. 41.

glär-läng-næss, s. [Eng. glaring; -ness.] The quality or state of being glaring.

"The glaringness of his prose."—Jarvis: Don Quixote, pt. i., bk. i., ch. i.

glär-ý*, glär-ie*, a. [Eng. glar(e); -y.] Of a dazzling or overpowering brightness or luster; glaring.

"In the winter time, so glarie is the ground, That neither grass, nor other graine, in pastures may be found."

Turberville, i. 386.

fäte, fät, färe, amidst, whät, fäll, father; wë, wët, hère, camël, hër, thère; pine, pít, síre, sír, marine; gô, pôť, or, wöre, wölf, wörk, whô, sôn; mäte, cüb, cüre, unite, cür, räle, füll; trý, sýrian. æ, œ = ë; ey = ä. qu = kw.

glas'-er-ite, s. [Named after a chemist, Christopher Glaser, who flourished about A. D. 1664, the salt having long ago been called sal polychrestum Glaseri.]

Min.: The same as Aphthalite (q. v.). The Br. Mus. Catalogue prefers the name Glaserite, and makes Aphthalite the synonym.

glas-fat, *glæs-fat, s. [A. S. glæs-fæt; O. H. Ger. glasfatz; M. H. Ger. glasevaz; Ger. glasgefäss.] A glass vessel or pot.

"Anne while after than that glasfat an honden nom."
Layamon, ii. 319.

glas'-ites, s. pl. [GLASSITES.]

glass, *glas, *glase, *glasse, *gles, *gles, *glese, s. & a. [A. S. glas; cogn. with Dut. glas; Dan. glas; Sw. glas; Icel. gler, glas; Ger. glas; O. Sw. glas, gler; O. H. Ger. glas.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) In the same sense as II. 2.

(2) A glass vessel or instrument of any kind, as—

(a) A mirror; a looking-glass.

"Whoever in those glasses looks, may find The spots returned, or graces, of his mind."

Walter: Upon Ben Jonson.

(b) A drinking-vessel or cup made of glass.

"To this last costly treaty,

That swallowed so much treasure, and like a glass
Did break in the rinsing."

Shakesp.: Henry VIII., i. 1.

(c) An optical instrument composed partly of glass; a telescope.

"The moon whose orb Through optic glass the Tuscan artist views,"

Milton: P. L., i. 239.

(d) A glass vessel partially filled with fine sand for measuring time; an hour-glass.

"Were my wife's liver

Infected as her life, she would not live
The running of one glass."

Shakesp.: Winter's Tale, i. 2.

(e) An instrument, composed partly of glass, for indicating atmospheric changes; a barometer; a thermometer.

(f) (Pl.) A pair of spectacles or eye-glasses.

(3) The quantity which a glass drinking-vessel will hold.

"Your son should never chat over a glass of wine till midnight."—Locke: On Education, § 21.

*2. Fig.: The time in which the sand of man's life runs out; the allotted life of man.

II. Technically:

1. Chem.: A substance or mixture, earthy, saline, or metallic, brought by fusion to the state of a hard, brittle, transparent mass, with a conchoidal fracture.

2. Comm.: A hard, brittle, transparent substance, formed by fusing together mixtures of the silicates of potash, soda, lime, magnesia, alumina, and lead in various proportions, according to the quality or kind of glass required.

Flint-glass is used in making table-ware and many articles of domestic furniture and fittings. The molten glass is taken from the pot by a ponty, and is blown or pressed into shape, or, by a combination of operations, is held in a mold while being blown. Its density is 3. Crown and flint-glass are combined in the manufacture of achromatic lenses.

Crown-glass is taken by the ponty from the pot, and is then blown and whirled until it becomes globular. A ponty tipped with molten glass is applied to the bulb, the blowing-tube detached, leaving a hole. The globe being again whirled, the glass flashes into a circular disk, adhering by a boss in its center to the ponty. Its density is 2.5.

Sheet-glass is glass withdrawn by the ponty from the pot and blown and whirled till it assumes a cylindrical form. The ends being cut off, and the cylinder slit longitudinally, the sheet is heated, pressed, and rubbed until it is flattened out. This is also called cylinder-glass or broad-glass.

Plate-glass is made by pouring it upon a table which has a marginal edge of a height equal to that designed for the thickness of the glass. A roller travels over the table, resting on the ledges and flattening out the glass, which is thus made of equal thickness throughout.

Bottle-glass has nothing peculiar in the mode of its manufacture, but is made of coarse ingredients.

† Pliny reports that some mariners with a cargo of "nitrum" (soda or some other salt), having landed near the mouth of a small stream, at the base of Mount Carmel, in Palestine, lit a fire, using some blocks of the salt for a grate. The heat fused the sand and the salt together, and produced glass, which then for the first time became known. The occurrence may have happened, but glass was known in Egypt, and represented on the monuments, as early as the time of Osirtasen, B. C. 1740. Remains have been found also in the ruins, not merely of Egyptian, but of Assyrian, Greek, Roman, and Etruscan cities. The ancients used it for bottles; for instance many lachrymatories of it have been found. Gregory of Tours says that in the fourth century churches had colored glass windows. In 1458 Æneas Sylvius mentioned, as a proof of the wealth of Vienna, that the houses of the inhabitants had glass windows.

3. Nautical: The half-minute or quarter-minute sand-glass used with the ship's log; also the half-hour or sand-glass which regulates the watches; the time in which one of such glasses is emptied of its sand.

"Past the mid-season: at least two glasses."

Shakesp.: Tempest, i. 2.

B. As adj.: Made of Glass; resembling glass.

glass annealing-furnace, subst. A furnace in which articles or sheets of glass are kept for a while in a heated condition, and allowed gradually to cool; a leer.

glass-blower, s. One whose business or trade is to blow or fashion glass.

Glass-blower's lamp: A gas or alcohol lamp.

glass-blowing, s. A mode of manufacturing glass-ware and window-glass by taking a mass of viscid glass from the melting-pot on the end of the blowing-tube, and then inflating the mass by blowing through the tube, rolling on the marver, and exposing it at the furnace opening where its contained air is expanded and itself enlarged.

glass-case, s. A case or shallow box having a glass lid or cover, and sides, so as to enable the contents to be seen without opening the case.

glass-cavity, s.

Min.: A cavity in a mineral containing a glassy substance. These cavities are sometimes found in crystals of leucite.

glass-cloth, s.

Fabric: A fabric produced by interweaving fabrics of glass, which are, in a very attenuated state, extremely flexible.

glass-coach, s. A carriage of the superior order. The term is now obsolete, but it originally expressed that the vehicle had glass windows instead of opaque panels or curtains.

glass-coloring, s. The art or art of tinting glass by incorporating metallic oxides in its substance; thus oxide of cobalt imparts a deep blue color; protoxide of copper, green; oxide of gold, a ruby red, &c. Colored glass is known as flashed, or as pot-metal; in the former case a film of colored glass is laid over the white; in the latter, the color is stirred up with the metal in the pot, imbuing its whole substance.

Zool.: A crustacean which received its name from its transparency, while, on account of its very much flattened and membranous body, it was called by Leach, Phyllosoma. It is now known to be an immature state of the Podophthalmata (q. v.).

glass-cutter, s. One whose business or occupation is to cut glass, or to grind it down into various ornamental shapes; an instrument for cutting glass.

glass-cutting, s. The art or process of cutting, shaping or modifying the surface of glass by mechanical means, as by revolving wheels of iron, stone, or wood supplied with sand and water, or by means of a blast of air or steam carrying a stream of sand, which is directed upon the part to be cut or bored.

glass-enamel, s. A term applied to a semi-lucid or an opaque glass, which owes its milkiness to the addition of binocide of tin. The transparencies which are hung in windows or form shades for lamps are of this semi-lucid character, and are mis-called porcelain transparencies. Watch-dials have an opaque, glass-enamelled face on a metallic backing.

1. Ord. Lang.: A ball or shell of glass, colored to represent a human eye, worn by persons who have lost an eye.

2. Ornith.: The name given in Jamaica to a thrush, Turdus jamaicensis, which has a pellucid glass-like eye.

Glass-eye berry: A berry on which the Glass-eye feeds.

glass-faced, a. Reflecting, like a mirror, the looks of another; as, a glass-faced flatterer.

glass-furnace, s. A furnace in which the materials of glass are fused.

glass-gall, s. [SANDIVER.]

glass-gazing, a. Often contemplating one's self in a mirror.

glass-grinder, s. The same as GLASS-CUTTER (q. v.).

glass-grinding, s. The same as GLASS-CUTTING (q. v.).

glass-hive, s. A hive composed wholly or in part of glass.

glass-maker, s. One whose business or trade is to make glass.

Glass-maker's soap: A name given to manganese, from its cleansing action in its association with glass-making materials. It is used to rid the materials of color arising from carbonaceous matters and protoxide of iron. An excess of it gives a purple tinge to the glass.

glass-mosaic, s. An imitation of antique mosaic work, formed of small cubes of glass mixed with various coloring matters, chiefly metallic oxides, so as to form opaque colored enamels, which are cast into slabs or flat cakes, the slab being afterwards cut into very small cubes or rectangular pieces. With these little colored cubes a picture is built up, by inserting each one separately in a bed of cement.

glass-mold, s. A metallic shaping-box in which glass is pressed or blown to form.

glass-oven, s. A heated chamber in which just-made glass in sheets or ware is placed to cool gradually. A glass-annealing furnace; a leer.

glass-painter, s. One who produces designs in colors on glass.

glass-painting, s. Glass-painting is thus distinguished from glass-staining: the former has a design painted upon it with colors which are burnt in; the latter receives its color in the process of manufacture, or the separate pieces are colored after having been cut to the required shapes out of white glass. In one case it is a painting of enamelled colors on sheets of glass; in the other it is a painting made up of pieces having the required colors, fitting together and held by leaden cames.

[GLASS-STAINING.] There are four methods: 1. The mosaic, the earliest. 2. The mosaic stain. In this mode the window is made up of detached pieces, as in the mosaic; but the shades are given by a stain of brown, which seems to have been the first color which the artists succeeded in firing on to the pieces of glass. 3. The enamel. By this all the required colors are painted upon the same piece of glass and fired in the kiln, producing the effect of an oil-painting. 4. The mosaic enamel. In this mode colored glass is used as a groundwork to paint on, instead of white.

glass-paper, s. A polishing-paper made of paper thickly strewn with finely-powdered glass. The fragments of broken wine-bottles, &c., are carefully washed to remove dirt, the glass is crushed under a revolving stone and sifted into six sizes, as in manufacturing emery. It is sifted through sieves of wire-cloth, which are generally cylindrical, like the bolts of flour-mills. The cloths have from sixteen to ninety wires to the inch. A surface of thin glue is spread on the paper, and the pulverized glass dusted over it with a sieve.

glass-press, s. A device to apply pressure to glass in a mold while in a plastic state.

Zool.: Hyalonema, a genus of siliceous sponges, consisting of a cup-shaped body affixed to a muddy part of the sea-bottom by means of a rope of long twisted siliceous fibers.

glass-shade, s. A cover of glass placed over artificial flowers, or articles of value, to protect them from the dust; or over gas-jets, lamps, &c., to modulate and equalize the light.

Zool.: Hyalea or Hyalæa, a genus of Pteropoda, with a translucent shell.

glass-shrimp, s.

Zool.: Eriothys, a genus of crustaceans, order Stomatopoda.

glass-silvering, s. The process of coating glass with silver, mercury, &c., in order to form mirrors. [MIRROR.]

glass-snail, s.

Zool.: Vitrina, a genus of mollusks, family Helicidae. Vitrina pellucida and two other species occur in Britain.

glass-snake, s.

Zool.: Ophisaurus ventralis. A lizard, of the family Zonuride, or Chalcidæ. From the absence of feet, they look like serpents. They are found in this country. The name glass-snake is supposed to allude to the brittleness of their tail.

glass-soap, s. [GLASS-MAKER'S SOAP.]

glass-stainer, s. One who follows the trade or occupation of glass-staining.

glass-staining, s. The art or process of coloring glass during the process of manufacture.

glass-stopper, s. A stopper or stopple for bottles, made of glass.

glass-tears, s. pl. [RUPERT'S-DROPS.]

bôll, bôy; pout, jôwî; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f.
-cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shûn; -tion, -sion = shûn. -tious, -cious, -sious = shis. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del.

glass-tongs, s. pl. Grippers for hot bottles, &c., in course of manufacture, or for handling bottles containing heated or freezing mixtures.

glass, v. t. [GLASS, s.]

1. To see or look at in a glass or mirror.

"The formal youth, that knew no other grace
Or value, but his title, and his lace, Glasses himself."

L'Estrange: On Beaum. & Flet. Plays.

2. To reflect or show as in a glass or mirror.

"Wherein is glassed serenity of soul."

Byron: Manfred, ii. 2.

3. To case or inclose in glass.

"Methought all his senses were lockt in his eye,
As jewels in crystal for some prince to buy.
Who tend'ring their own worth, from whence they were glass'd,
Did point out to buy them, along as you past."

Shakesp.: Love's Labor's Lost, ii.

4. To cover as with glass; to glaze.

"I have observed little grains of silver to be hid in the small cavities, perhaps glassed over by a vitrifying heat."

Boyle.

glass-chord, s. [Eng. glass, and chord.]

Music. A musical instrument with keys like a pianoforte, but with bars of glass instead of strings of wire.

glass-ég, s. pl. [GLASS.] Spectacles.

glass-fül, s. [Eng. glass, -ful(l).] As much of anything as a glass will hold.

glass-höuse, s. [Eng. glass, and house.]

1. Ordinary Language:

1. A house or building where glass is made; glass-works.

"I remember to have met with an old Roman mosaic composed of little pieces of clay half vitrified, and prepared at the glasshouses."—Addison: On Italy.

2. A house built entirely or chiefly of glass; a conservatory.

II. Fig.: A position open to attack or to unfavorable criticism; hence the proverb. Those who live in glasshouses should not throw stones.

glass-ly, adv. [Eng. glassy; -ly.]

1. So as to resemble glass.

2. With glassy eyes.

"Vance stared glassily around him."—Mortimer Collins: From Midnight to Midnight, vol. iii., ch. x.

glass-ly-ness, s. [Eng. glassy; -ness.] The quality or state of being glassy, a vitreous appearance.

"The glassiness of the surface."—Smollett: France and Italy, lett. xxxi.

glass-ling, s. [Eng. glass; -ing.]

Leather-manufact.: The operation of dressing leather on the grain side by a tool consisting of a glass slip set in a wooden handle.

Glass-ites, Glas-ites, s. pl. [For etymol. see def.]

Ch. Hist.: A Christian sect founded by the Rev. John Glas, minister of the Established Church of Scotland. Having been deposed, in 1729, by the Synod of Angus, he founded the sect called after his name. With regard to faith he believed it to be an intellectual act of assent to the Divine testimony. In 1753 Mr. Sandeman, his son-in-law, embraced his opinions, carrying them to a more extreme length. In 1760 the son-in-law removed to London, and in 1764 to America. Being better known in these places than Mr. Glas, the churches were called Sandemanian. [SANDEMANIANS.]

glass-like, a. [Eng. glass, and like.] Like or resembling glass; glassy; of a vitreous appearance.

"For by example most we sinned before,
And glasslike clearness mixed with frailty bore."

Dryden: Astræa Redux, 208.

glass-män, s. [Eng. glass, and man.] One who deals in glass.

"The profit of glasses consists only in a small present made by the glassman."—Swift.

glass-mét-al, s. [Eng. glass, and metal.] Glass in fusion in the pot.

"Let proof be made of the incorporating of copper or brass with glassmetal."—Bacon: Physical Remains.

glass-pöt, s. [Eng. glass, and pot.] The pot in which the frit is fused into glass. They are made of pure refractory clay, mixed with about one-fifth its weight of old pots pulverized by grinding, are built up instead of being formed on a mold, and baked by being subjected to a white heat.

glass-wäre, s. [Eng. glass, and ware.] Articles or utensils manufactured of glass.

glass-wörk, s. [Eng. glass, and work.]

1. The manufacture of glass.

2. Articles or utensils manufactured of glass; glassware.

3. (Pl.): A place or building where glass is manufactured.

"They crush the ashes into lumps like a stone, and so sell them to the Venetians for their glassworks."—Bacon: Natural History.

glass-wörm, s. [Eng. glass, and worm.] A glow-worm.

glass-wört, s. [Eng. glass, and wort.]

Bot.: Salicornia, a genus of flowerless plants growing in salt marshes.

"For the fine glass we use the purest of the finest sand, and the ashes of chali or glasswort."—Browne: Vulgar Errors.

glass-ý, glass-ie, glas-y, a. [English glass; -y; -ie.]

1. Made of glass.

"Honor is like that glassy bubble
That finds philosophers much trouble."

Butler: Hudibras, pt. ii., c. ii.

2. Resembling glass in luster or some other quality.

"His conscience, like a glassy lake before, Lashed into foaming waves, begins to roar."

Cowper: Truth, 259.

3. Dull; lacking fire or life; applied to the eyes.

glassy-felspar, s.

Min.: The same as SANIDINE (q. v.).

Glas-tön-bür-ý (t silent), s & a. [See def.]

A. As substantive.

Geog.: A town in Somersetshire, England, the seat of a celebrated abbey, now in ruins.

B. As adj.: Of or belonging to the town or abbey mentioned under A.

Glastonbury-thorn, s.

Hort.: A variety of the common hawthorn. Said to have been introduced by the monks of the abbey.

gläub-áp-a-tite, s. [Eng. glau(er), and apatite.]

Min.: A variety of Apatite, in color yellowish-brown to chocolate-brown, from Monk's Island.

gläu-bër, s. [Named after Glauber, a German chemist, who first artificially made glauher-salt. He died in 1668.] (For def., see etym. and compound.)

glauher-salt, glauher's-salt, s.

1. Chem. & Pharm.: A name popularly given to sodium sulphate, $\text{Na}_2\text{SO}_4 \cdot 10\text{H}_2\text{O}$.

2. Min.: The same as MIRABILITE (q. v.).

gläu-bër-ite, s. [Eng., &c., glauher, and suff. -ite (Min.), (q. v.).]

Min.: A monoclinic yellow, gray, or brick-red mineral, of vitreous luster and white streak; its hardness, 2.5-3; its specific gravity, 2.64-2.85. Composition: Sulphate of soda, 51.1; sulphate of lime, 48.9=100. Occurs in New Castle in Spain, in Upper Austria, in Bavaria, in California, and in Peru. (Dana.) gläu-česč-enče, s. [Latin glau(cus); suffix -escence.] The state of being glaucescent or slightly sea-green in luster.

gläu-česč-ent, a. [Latin glaucus, and suffix -escent.] [GLAUCCUS.]

Botany.: Becoming sea-green. Not very different from glaucous (q. v.).

gläu-čic, a. [From Lat. glau(cium), and Eng., &c., suff. -ic.]

Chem.: Of, belonging to, existing in, or derived from glau(cium) (q. v.).

glauic acid, s.

Chem.: The acid contained in Glau(cium flavum), identical with fumaric acid.

gläu-čín, gläu-čine, s. [Lat. glau(cium), and Eng., &c., suff. -ine (Chem.).]

Chem.: The alkaloid contained in the leaves of Glau(cium flavum). The leaves are macerated with acetic acid, then the juice is pressed out, boiled, filtered, and the filtrate treated with lead nitrate, which precipitates lead fumarate. The filtrate is treated with H_2S , then the glaucine is precipitated with tannin, and the precipitate decomposed by chalk. Glaucine crystallizes out of water in small crystalline scales; it is easily soluble in alcohol and ether. It forms crystalline salts.

tgläu-čine, a. [Lat. glau(cu); -ine.]

Bot.: The same as GLAUCCUS (q. v.).

gläu-čl-üm, s. [Lat. glau(cium); Gr. glaukion=the juice of a plant, probably the Horned-poppy, Glau(cium corniculatum).]

Bot.: A genus of Papaveraceæ. It consists of glaucous poppies with yellow juice. The flowers are large, yellow or purple, the ovary two-celled; placentas two, seeds many, testa pitted. Known species, five or six.

gläu-cö, pref. [Lat. glaucus; Gr. glaukos.]

Min., &c.: Of a glaucous color.

gläu-cö-döte, gläu-cö-döt, s. [Ger. glauccodot: pref. glauco- (q. v.), and Gr. dotos=a gift.]

Min.: An orthorhombic, greenish, tin-white mineral of metallic luster and white streak; its hardness, 5; specific gravity, 6. Composition: Sulphur, 19.4; arsenic, 45.5; cobalt, 23.8; iron, 11.3=100. Occurs in chlorite slate in the province of Huasco in Chili, also in Sweden. (Dana, &c.)

gläu-cö-lite, s. [Ger. glauccolith: pref. glauco- (q. v.); Gr. lithos=a stone.]

Min.: A blue or greenish-gray variety of Scapolite from the region east of Lake Baikal, where it occurs in veins in granite.

gläu-cö-mä, s. [Lat., from Gr. glaukōma, from glaukos=pale blue or gray, and omma=the eye; from the dull gray gleam of the eye affected by the disease.]

Med.: A fault in the eye, which changes the crystalline humor into a grayish color, without detriment of sight, and therein differs from what is commonly understood by suffusion. (Quincy.)

gläu-cöm-a-toüs, a. [Latin glaucoma; Gr. glaukōma [GLAUCCOMA], genit. glaukōmatos, Eng. adj. suff. -ous.]

Med.: Of, belonging to, or having the nature of glaucoma (q. v.).

gläu-cö-nite, s. [Pref. glauco- (q. v.); n euphonic (?), and suff. -ite (Min.) (q. v.). Named from its green color.]

Min.: An amorphous green opaque mineral, like earthy chlorite, with a dull or glistening luster; its hardness, 2; specific gravity, 2.2 to 2.4. It is a hydrous silicate of iron and potash. Composition: Silica, 49.3; alumina, 3.6; sesquioxide of iron, 22.7; protoxide of iron, 6.3; potash, 8.3, and water, 9.6. There are two varieties of it; the one the green earth of cavities in eruptive rocks, the other the green grains in greensand formation, or anything similar. Found in many places.

gläu-cö-nit-ic, a. [Eng. glauconit(e); -ic.]

Min. & Geol.: Of or belonging to glauconite.

"Glaucinitic grains of greensand."—Nicholson: Paleont. ii. 516.

gläu-cö-phäno, s. [Pref. glauco-, and phainō=to make to appear.]

Min.: An orthorhombic or monoclinic mineral, translucent or opaque, occurring in six-sided prisms. Hardness, 3.5; specific gravity, 3.1; colors, lavender, blue, bluish-black, or grayish; streak, powder, grayish-blue. Composition: Silica, 56.49; alumina, 12.23; protoxide of iron, 10.91; protoxide of manganese, 0.50; magnesia, 7.97; lime, 2.25; soda and potassa, 9.28. Occurs in the island of Syra, one of the Cyclades. (Dana.) gläu-cö-pi-crine, s. [Pref. glauco-, and picrine (q. v.).]

Chem.: An alkaloid occurring in the root of Glau(cium flavum). The root is exhausted with acetic acid, then precipitated with ammonia, redissolved in acetic acid, then precipitated with a solution of oak bark, and decomposing the precipitate with chalk, is crystallized out of ether. Glaucopierine forms granular needles, which are soluble in alcohol and in water. When heated with concentrated sulphuric acid it gives a dark grass-green color. The salts of glaucopierine are crystalline, and have a very bitter taste.

gläu-cö-pi-nä, s. [Mod. Lat. glaucoop(is) (q. v.), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -ina.]

Ornith.: The name given by Swainson to the Wattle-crows, a sub-family of Corvidæ. The bill is short; the culmen elevated and curved from the base; the upper mandible entire; the wings short, rounded; the tail lengthened, graduated, or cuneated.

gläu-cö-plis, s. [Gr. glaukōpis=having fierce, gleaming eyes; glaukos [GLAUCCUS], and ops=the eye.]

Ornith.: The typical genus of the sub-family Glaucopineæ. Glau(copsis cinerea) occurs in New Zealand.

gläu-cö-sid-ër-ite, s. [Pref. glauco-, and Eng., &c., siderite (q. v.); Gr. glaukosiderit.]

Min.: The same as VIVIANITE (q. v.).

gläu-cö-sis, s. [Gr. glaukōsis=blindness, produced by glaucoma (q. v.).]

Path.: (For def. see etym.).

gläu-coüs, a. [Lat. glauccus; Gr. glaukos=(1) glancing silver, (2) pale blue, gray.]

Bot.: Sea-green, dull green, passing into grayish-blue.

gläu-cüs, s. [Latin Glauccus; Greek glaukos.] [GLAUCCUS.]

1. Class. Myth.: A fisherman of Antheion, in Eubœa, who, seeing that a fish brought ashore so recovered its strength by eating a certain herb that it was able again to leap into the water, had the curiosity himself to taste the plant, which he had no sooner done than he plunged into the deep and became a sea god. (Ovid: Metam. vii. 233, &c.)

fäte, fät, färe, amidst, whät, fäll, father; wê, wët, hère, camel, hër, there; pine, pît, sîre, sir, marine; gö, pôt, or, wöre, wölf, wörk, whô, sôn; müte, cüb, cüre, unite. cür, räde, füll; trÿ, Syrian. æ, œ = ê; ey = ä. qu = kw.

2. Zoöl. (of the form glaucus): A genus of Nudi-branchiate Gasteropods, family Eulidae. The animal is elongated and slender, with the foot linear and channelled, the tentacles four, the gills slender, and supported on three pairs of lateral lobes. Known species, seven; floating on seaweed in the Atlantic and Pacific, their food being small sea-jellies. Mr. C. Bennett, who captured Glaucus hexapterygius in a towing net, in lat. 4° 26' N., long. 19° 30' W., describes its beauty as remarkable. The upper parts were of a brilliant red color, the lower ones nearly white.

glauum, v. i. To snatch greedily.

"To hear the thuds, and see the cluds,
O' clans frae woods, in tartan duds,
Wha glauimed at kingdoms three, man."

Burns: Battle of Sheriff Muir.

gläux, s. [Lat. glauus; Gr. glauos=(1) the owl, from its glaring eyes; (2) a plant, the Milk vetch (Astragalus glauus of Linnaeus; glaz=the plant only, from glaukos.] [GLAUCOUS.]

Bot.: Sea-milkwort, a genus of Primulaceae, family Primulidæ. Flowers small, axillary sessile, white, or pink; calyx five-parted, colored; corolla wanting; stamens five, hypogynous, alternate with the lobes of the calyx; ovary subglobose; style filiform; stigma obtuse; capsula five-valved, few-seeded.

gläve, s. [GLAIVE.]

"As they have a method of glazing it, it is more durable."—Cook: Voyages, vol. iii., bk. ii., ch. iii.

B. Intrans.: To become glassy; to assume a dull, glassy appearance; to become overspread with a semi-transparent film.

"A light on Marmion's visage spread,
And fired his glazing eye."

Scott: Marmion, vi. 32.

gläze, s. [GLAZE, v.] A vitrifiable composition for covering earthenware or porcelain. Glaze on earthenware has several objects: (1) To render the ware impermeable to liquids, (2) To impart luster, (3) To preserve colors and patterns. In cookery the word is applied to the white of eggs, or strong gravy or jelly boiled down to the consistency of a thin cream, and used to cover pastry, &c., with a glossy, shining coating. In painting it is used for any kind of varnish intended to preserve the picture from the effects of the atmosphere, and to add brilliancy to the colors.

"It is late in the day to discuss the chromatic range of Sir Joshua's palette, or to argue about his mixtures, and his glazes."—Pall Mall Gazette.

glaze-dew, s.

Bot.: Stilbum; a genus of hypomycetous fungi.

glaze-kill, s.

Pottery: A kiln in which glazed biscuit-ware is placed for firing. It is analogous to the glost-oven (q. v.).

gläzed, pa. par. or a. [GLAZE, v.]

glazed-board, s. A kind of mill-board having a hard, smooth surface, to give a smooth face to the paper or fabric pressed between such boards.

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As substantive:

1. The act or process of setting glass in window sashes, picture frames, &c.; the art or trade of a glazier.

"Nay, in spite of constant glazing and tiling, the rain perpetually drenched the apartments."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xii.

2. The act of giving a glazed or shining appearance to, resembling that of glass; the act of covering with a glaze, as potters' ware, pastry, &c.

3. The act of polishing metal on a wheel dusted with polishing-powder.

4. The act of spreading a semi-pellucid cover over a painting to soften asperities.

5. The act or process of giving a glazed or glossy surface to gunpowder. All good powder is glazed in order to enable it to more perfectly resist moisture and bear transportation.

*6. Glasswork; glazed windows.

glazing-machine, s. A press with two polished rollers to calender paper.

glazing-wheel, s. A wooden wheel covered with leather charged with emery, and used by cutlers, especially for grinding and sharpening knives, tools, &c. It is also used instead of filing for leveling and surfacing many metallic articles; for removing the scale from casting, and for trimming small castings, such as builders' hardware. A wooden wheel without any covering is used by lapidaries in smoothing soft and rounded stones. These wheels are used with flour-emery and water.

glëad (1), s. [GLEDE.]

glëad (2), s. [GLEED.]

glëam, s. [A. S. glæm, glæm; cogn. with O. S. glimo=brightness; O. H. Ger. glimo=a glow-with; allied to glow and glimmer.]

1. A flash or shoot of light; a gleam, a ray; a little stream of light; brightness, splendor, luster.

"For this in Autumn searched the blooming waste, Nor lost one sunny gleam? for this sad fate?"

Thomson: Autumn, i. 137.

2. A short or sudden glimpse or sight; a ray.

*Crabb thus discriminates between gleam, glimmer, ray, and beam: "Certain portions of light are designated by these terms, but the gleam and glimmer are indefinite; the ray and beam are definite. The gleam is properly the commencement of light, or that portion of opening light which interrupts the darkness; the glimmer is an unsteady gleam; ray and beam are portions of light which emanate from some luminous body; the former from all luminous bodies in general, the latter more particularly from the sun. . . . Gleam and ray may be applied figuratively; beam only in the natural sense. a gleam of light may break in on the bonighted understanding, but a glimmer of light rather confuses." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) glëam (1), v. i. & t. [GLEAM, s.]

A. Intransitive:

"Y wot no gameth the no gle."

Legend of St. Gregory, 162.

*4. Metaphorically applied to a struggle of any kind; a battle; a contest.

"Thoht in to the Forest to ly,—

And with trawill, and stalwart fyght,

Chace Dowglas out off the contré

Bot othyr wayis then yield the gle."

Barbour, ix. 701.

II. Music: A composition for voices in harmony, consisting of two or more contrasted movements, with the parts so contrived that they may be termed a series of interwoven melodies. It may be written for three or more voices, either equal or mixed; but it is necessary that there should be only one voice to a part. It may be designed with or without instrumental accompaniment, and set to words in any style—amatory, bacchanalian, pastoral, didactic, comic, or serious. As a composition the glee appears to have historically followed the catch, and to have had its origin at the time when part-singing began to be revived. (Stainer & Barrett.)

glee-club, s. A society formed for the practice and performance of glees and part-songs.

glee-maiden, s. A female dancer and singer.

"The jongleurs, or jugglers, as we learn from the elaborate work of the late Mr. Strutt on the sports and pastimes of the people of England, used to call in the aid of various assistants, to render these performances as captivating as possible. The glee-maiden was a necessary attendant. Her duty was tumbling and dancing; and, therefore, the Anglo-Saxon version of Saint Mark's Gospel states Herodias to have vaulted or tumbled before King Herod. In Scotland these poor women seem, even at a late period, to have been bondswomen to their masters."—Scott: Note to the Lady of the Lake, vi. 6.

glēē-craft, gleo-craēft, s. [A. S. gleocraēft.] The science or knowledge of music.

glō-bif-ēr-ōūs, a. [Lat. globus=a globe, a ball; fero=to bear.]

Entom.: Bearing a globe or sphere; used of one of the joints of some antennæ.

glō-bīg-ēr-ī-nā, s. [Lat. globus=a globe; gero=to carry, to have, to bear, and neut. plur. adj. suff. -ina.]

1. Zool.: The typical genus of the family Globigerinidae, or Globigerinidae. Shell many-chambered, consisting of globose segments arranged in a turbinate spiral or irregularly disposed. The chambers open into a deep, central, umbilical depression.

2. Palaeont.: The genus came into existence at least as early as the Chalk, and perhaps even in the Trias. [GLOBIGERINA-MUD.]

globigerina-mud, s.

Geol.: A light-colored calcareous mud in places in the Atlantic 3,000 fathoms deep, and abounding in Globigerinae, rich in siliceous sponges, and often supporting a varied fauna of Mollusca, Crustacea, and Echinoderms. Prof. Thomson believed it to be not merely a chalk formation, but a continuation of what is technically called the Cretaceous formation, the Atlantic having apparently occupied the same geographical situation during the long period since the chalk was laid down.

globigerina-ooze, s. The same as GLOBIGERINA-MUD (q. v.).

"The now well-known calcareous deposit, the Globigerina-ooze, consisting to a great extent of the shells, more or less broken and decomposed, of pelagic foraminifera."—Sir Wyville Thomson: Voyage of the Challenger (1877), II, 251.

glō-bīg-ēr-ī-nī-dā, glō-bīg-ēr-ī-nī-dā, s. pl. [Eng., &c., globigerin(a); Lat. fem. or neut. pl. adj. suff. -idā, -ida.]

1. Zool.: A family of Foraminifera, sub-order Perforata. The shell is hyaline or vitreous. The chambers generally communicate with one another by a larger or smaller crescentic aperture, not by circular pores. Genera, Globigerina, Orbulina, Oculina, &c.

2. Palaeont.: The family came into existence apparently at least as early as the Trias.

glō-bīrd, s. [GLOBARD.] A glow-worm.

glōb-īst, s. [English glob(e); -ist.] One who understands the use of the globes.

"Being a good globist he will quickly find the zenith."—Howell: Instruct. for Foraine Travel (Appendix).

"Large globous iron fly, or dreadful hiss, Singing the air." Phillips: Bienheim.

glōb-ū-lār, a. [Lat. globulus, dimin. of globus=a globe, a sphere; Fr. globulaire.] Having the form or shape of a globe or sphere; globe-shaped, round, spherical.

"The form of the body is usually oblong, but when alarmed it has the power of inflating the belly to a globular shape of great size."—Pennant: British Zoology. The Globe Tetradon.

globular-chart, s. A chart of the whole or some part of the surface of the earth on a globular projection (q. v.).

†globular-minerals, s. pl.

Min.: Minerals occurring in almost complete spheres.

globular-projection, s.

Map-making: A kind of projection proposed by Lahire, in which the eye is supposed to look from a point distant from the globe half the chord of an arc of 90°. The objection to it which has prevented its coming into use is that the great circles appear as ellipses; but withal the distortion is less than in the stereographic projections so continually employed.

globular-sailing, s.

Naut.: A term employed to denote the sailing from one point to another over an arc of a great circle, which is the shortest distance between such points.

glōb-ū-lār-ī-a, s. [Lat. globulus=a little ball, a globule; dimin. of globus=a globe. So named from the flowers being in globose heads.]

Bot.: A genus of Selaginaceae (Selagids). Globularia alpinum, which grows in Southern Europe, is a bitter drastic purgative and emetic; it was once supposed to be the alupum of Dioscorides. Globularia vulgaris, also European, has similar qualities.

†glōb-ū-lār-ī-ā-čē-ā, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. globulari(a), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -aceae.]

Bot.: An old order of plants adopted by Lindley in his Natural System of Botany, but in his Vegetable Kingdom merged in Selaginaceae (q. v.).

glōb-ū-lār-ī-tŷ, s. [Eng. globular; -ity.] The quality or state of being globular; sphericity glōb-ū-lār-lŷ, adv. [Eng. globular; -ly.] In a globular or spherical manner; in manner of a sphere; spherically.

glōb-ū-lār-nēss, s. [English globular; -ness.] The quality or state of being globular; sphericity.

glōb-ūle, s. [Fr., from Lat. globulus, dimin. of globus=a ball, a sphere.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A little ball, globe, or sphere; a particle of matter in a globular or spherical form.

"And sometimes a company of little icy globules, that is, misty drops, which have been suddenly frozen by the snow, will be piled one upon another, as to compose a little pyramid, terminating in one single globule at the top; not much unlike to a lavender spike."—Grew: Cosmologia Sacra, bk. I., ch. iii.

2. Any small body of globular or nearly globular form.

"These minute globules [the eyes of a mole] are sunk so deeply in the skull, and lie so sheltered within the velvet of its covering, as that any contraction of what may be called the eye-brows, not only closes up the apertures which lead to the eyes, but presents a cushion, as it were, to any sharp or protruding substance which might push against them."—Paley: Natural Theology, ch. xv.

II. Physiol.: The same as CORPUSCLE (q. v.).

"Blood consists of red globules, swimming in a thin liquor called serum: the red globules are elastic, and will break; the vessels which admit the smaller globule, cannot admit the greater without a disease."—Arbuthnot: On Aliments.

glōb-ū-lēt, s. [Eng. globul(e), and dimin. suff. -et.] A little globule; a very minute globular particle.

glōb-ū-lif-ēr-ōūs, s. [Lat. globulus=a little ball, a globule, and fero=to bear.]

Geol.: A variety of concretionary structure, where the concretions are isolated globules and uniformly distributed through the texture of the rock.

glōb-ū-lin, s. [Lat. globulus=a little globe; a globe; suff. -in. (Chem.)]

Chem.: Crystalline, Vitelline. An albuminous substance first obtained from the crystalline lens of the eye. Globulin thus obtained is a yellowish transparent mass, which swells up and dissolves in water; the solution becomes opaline at 73°, and coagulates at 93°. Globulin is an albuminate which is soluble in a ten per cent. aqueous solution of sodium chloride, and is reprecipitated by the addition of water, by long contact with which it loses its solubility with alkaline salts, and becomes similar to coagulated albumin. Vitellin can be obtained by treating the yolks of eggs with ether, and treating the residue with chloride of sodium solution, and precipitating with water.

glōb-ū-line, s. [GLOBULIN.]

Bot.: The name given by Turpin to the amylaceous granules so continually present in the cells of plants.

glōb-ū-līsm, s. [Eng. globul(e); -ism.]

Med.: A term sometimes applied to homoeopathy.

glōb-ū-lōse, glōb-ū-lōūs, a. [Fr. globuleux; Sp. & Ital. globuloso, from Lat. globulus=a globe (q. v.).] Having the form of a globe or sphere; globular; spherical.

"The globulus part of a glass-egg of about three inches (for it wanted 1-10th) in diameter on the outside was filled with water to the bottom of the stem."—Boyle: Works, II, 722.

glōb-ū-lōūs-nēss, s. [Eng. globulous; -ness.] The quality or state of being globulous; globularity.

"The same drops will readily adhere to gold, and loose their globulousness upon it."—Boyle: Works, II, 664.

glōb-ū-lūs (pl. glōb-ū-lī), s. [Lat.]

Botany:

1. A round, deciduous shield, formed of the thallus of a lichen, and leaving a hollow when it falls off. Example, Isidium. (L. Candolle.)

2. A kind of perithecium in some fungals.

3. The antheridium of Chara.

glō-būs, s. [Lat.=a globe or ball.]

Anat. & Pathol.: Thus in anatomy there are a globus major and a globus minor of the epididymis, forming part of the excretory duct of the testicle. (See also the compound.)

globus-hystericus, s.

Pathol.: A sensation in the early stage of hysteria, as if a ball or globe first rose to the stomach, then to the chest, and finally fixed itself in the throat with the ultimate sense of suffocation. It is produced by a spasmodic action of the glottis, preventing the escape upward of air which, being confined, distends the trachea or windpipe.

glōb-ŷ, a. [Eng. glob(e); -y.] Pertaining to or resembling a globe; spherical, round, orbicular.

"Every way do you yourselves disperse, Till you have filled this globy universe With your increase."—Drayton: Noah's Flood.

—Drayton: Polyolbion, s. 5.

3. Feeling sadness, depression, or dejection; melancholy; sullen; morose; downcast.

"Crabb thus discriminates between gloomy, sullen, morose, and splénetic: 'All these terms denote a temper of mind the reverse of easy or happy; gloomy lies either in the general constitution or particular frame of the mind; sullen lies in the temper: a man of a gloomy disposition is an involuntary agent; it is his misfortune, and renders him in some measure pitiable; the sullen man yields to his evil humors; sullenness is his fault, and renders him offensive. Sullenness and moroseness are both the inherent properties of the temper; but the former discovers itself in those who have to submit, and the latter in those who have to command; sullenness, therefore, betrays itself mostly in early life; moroseness is the peculiar characteristic of age. Sullenness shows itself mostly by an unseemly reserve; moroseness shows itself by the harshness of the speech, and the roughness of the voice.' (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) glööm-mindéd, a. Sad, dejected. (Thomson: On Sir Isaac Newton, 157.)

"Among them also that are good, euerie one, as he hath in this vsed himselfe, so shal he excell other in the gloriousnes of his new bodye."—Udall: 1 Corinth, ch. xv.

glör-ÿ, *gloir-e, *glor-ie, *glor-ye, s. [O. Fr. glorie (Fr. gloire), from Lat. gloria, for cloria, from the same root as in cluo; Gr. klyō=to hear; Lat. inclytus=renewed; Gr. kleos=glory, renown; Sp., Port., & Ital. gloria.]

I. Ordinary Language:

*1. Originally in a more extended sense than now, including vain glory, as well as glory of a more reputable kind; arrogance, pride, haughtiness.

"In military commanders and soldiers vain-glory is an essential point; for as iron sharpens iron, so by glory one courage sharpeneth another."—Bacon: Essays; Of Vain-glory.

2. Praise, honor, or admiration or distinction paid or ascribed to any person by general consent; renown, celebrity.

"For what is glory but the blaze of fame,
The people's praise, if always praise unmixed?"

Milton: P. R., iii. 47.

3. Adoration or praise ascribed in worship.

"Glory to God in the highest."—Luke ii. 14.

4. A state of splendor; greatness, grandeur, or magnificence.

And saints embrace thee with a love like mine."

Foote: Eloise to Abelard, 342.

7. A noble or praiseworthy pride.

"The success of those wars was too notable to be unknown to your ears, to which all worthy fame hath glory to come unto."—Sidney.

8. That which makes glorious, distinguished, or renowned; the distinguishing ornament or honor; that of which a person, place, or nation is or may be proud.

"Increasing London, Babylon of old Not more the glory of the earth than she."

Cowper: Task, i. 723.

9. A glorious, honorable, or worthy act; a source of honor.

"Think it no glory to swell in tyranny."—Sidney: Arcadia.

II. Technically:

1. Art: Properly, a combination of the nimbus and aureola, but commonly taken as the same as nimbus (q. v.).

2. Pyrotechnic: A cluster of large fixed suns. [FIXED-SUN.]

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between glory and honor: "Glory impels to extraordinary efforts and to great undertakings. Honor induces to a discharge of one's duty. Excellence in the attainment, and success in the exploit, bring glory; a faithful exercise of one's talents reflects honor. Glory is connected with everything which has a peculiar public interest; honor is more properly obtained within a private circle. Glory is not confined to the nation or life of the individual by whom it is sought; it spreads over all the earth, and descends to the latest posterity; honor is limited to those who are connected with the subject of it, and eye-witnesses to his actions. Glory is attainable but by few, and may be an object of indifference to any one; honor is more or less within the reach of all, and must be disregarded by no one. A thirst for glory is seldom indulged but at the expense of others; a love of honor can never be indulged but to the advantage of others." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) glory-hole, s.

Glass-manuf.: An opening in the wall of a glass-furnace, exposing the brilliant white of the interior.

glory-crowned, a. Having the head encircled with a glory.

glör-ÿ, v. i. & t. [O. Fr. glorie, from Lat. gloriator=to boast; Sp. & Port. gloriari; Ital. gloriare.] [GLORY, s.]

A. Intransitive:

1. To boast; to feel pride.

"This title of Freeholder is what I most glory in, and what most effectually calls to my mind the happiness of that government under which I live."—Addison: Freeholder.

*2. To exult with joy; to rejoice.

"Both glorying to have scapt the Stygian flood."

Milton: P. L., i. 239.

*B. Trans.: To make glorious; to glorify; to give glory to.

"The troop

That gloried Venus."

Greene: Looking-glass, p. 118.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between to glory and to boast: "To glory is to hold as one's glory. To boast is to set forth to one's advantage. To glory is more particularly the act of the mind, the indulgence of the internal sentiment: to boast denotes rather the expression of the sentiment. To glory is applied only to matters of moment; boast is rather suitable to trifling points. Glory is but seldom used in a bad sense, and boast still seldom in a good sense." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

*glör-ÿ-less, a. [Eng. glory; less.] Without glory; bereft of glory.

"Soulless, gloryless, and desperate."

Peete: Battle of Alcazar, ii. 3.

*glor-y-yn, v. t. [Etyim. doubtful.] To defile; to make dirty; to stain.

"Gloryyn or wythe onclene thyng befoyl'n. Maculo, deturpo."—Prompt. Parv.

*glöse (1), s. [GLOZE, s.]

*glöse, v. i. [GLOZE, v.]

*glös-ër, s. [GLOSSER, s.]

glöss (1), *glöse (2), s. [O. Fr. glose, from Lat. glossa=a word requiring explanation, from (Gr. glossa=the tongue, a difficult word; Icel. glösa; Sw. glosa; Dan. glose; Dut. glos; Sp. & Ital. glosa; Port. glossa.) [GLOZE.]

1. An explanatory note or remark on the margin or between the lines of a book, as an equivalent for foreign or strange words. (Originally inserted by the copyist of a manuscript, to make the meaning more plain.)

2. A comment, note, or explanation on a point of difficulty in a work, especially in one written in a foreign tongue; a scholium.

"No commentator's tedious gloss."

Cowper: A Manual.

*3. A false or specious interpretation or explanation.

"Thou hast made many glose with thy false talkyng."

Towneley Mysteries, p. 209.

glöss (2), s. [Icel. glossi=a blaze; Sw. dial. glása=a glowing, glossa=to glow, to shine; M. H. Ger. glosen=to glow, glose=a glow, a gleam. The word has been confused, and its meaning has been partially affected by the confusion with GLOSE (1), s.]

1. Lit.: The brightness or luster proceeding from a smooth, polished surface; polish, sheen, glossiness.

"Weeds that the wind did toss

The virgins wore: the youths woven coats, that cast a faint dim gloss Like that of oil."

Chapman: Homer's Iliad.

2. Fig.: A specious or fair outward appearance; external show pleasing to the eye.

"There is a sort of gloss upon ingenious falsehoods that dazzles the imagination, but which neither belongs to nor becomes the sober aspect of truth."—Burke: Vindication of National Society (Pref.).

*¶ To set a gloss on anything: To give it a specious appearance. (Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. I., iv. 1.) glöss (1), *glose, *glos-en, *glosse, *glos-yn, v. t. & i. [O. Fr. gloser; from Low Lat. glosso, from glossa=a gloss; Icel. glösa=to explain; Dut. glozen; Sp. glosar; Port. glossar; Ital. glossare.] [GLOSS (1), s.]

A. Transitive:

1. To explain by note, gloss, or comment; to comment on so as to render clear or plain; to annotate.

"This tale nedeth nought be glosed,
For it is openliche shewed." Gower iii., 219.

*2. To flatter, to wheedle.

"So wel he couthe me glose

When that he wold haue my bele chose." Chaucer: C. T., 6,091.

B. Intransitive:

1. To comment; to write or make comments or explanatory remarks.

"But no man can glosse upon this text after that manner, for the prophet says, No shepherd shall pitch his fold there, nor shall any man pass through it forever."—H. More: Defence of the Philosophic Cabbala, ch. iii.

*2. To flatter, to wheedle.

"Who that couthe glose softe
And flater, such he set afloat
In great estate." Gower, iii., 170.

*3. To make sly remarks.

And laughing glosed that Abra served so well."

Prior: Solomon, ii. 365.

glöss (2), v. t. [GLOSS (2), s.]

I. Lit.: To give a gloss or superficial luster to; to make glossy or lustrous; as, to gloss cloth or paper.

II. Figuratively:

1. To give a fair or specious appearance to; to render specious or plausible.

"Do I not reason wholly on your conduct?"

Philips.

2. To palliate by specious representation.

"Though every tongue should join in glossing over and even justifying all or any of those crimes."—Porteus, vol. ii., ser. 16.

¶ (1) In the figurative senses there is evidently a confusion with Gloss (1), v.

(2) Crabb thus discriminates between to gloss, to varnish, and to palliate: "Gloss and varnish are figurative terms, which borrow their signification from the act of rendering the outer surface of any physical object shining. To gloss is to give a gloss or brightness to anything by means of friction, as in the case of japan or mahogany: to varnish is to give an artificial gloss, by means of applying a foreign substance. Hence in the figurative use of the terms, to gloss is to put the best face upon a thing by various little distortions and artifices; but to varnish is to do the same thing by means of direct falsehood: to palliate requires still less artifice than either." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) glös-sa-grā, s. [Gr. glossa=the tongue, and agra=a catching.]

Pathol.: A rheumatic pain in the tongue.

glöss-än-thrāx, s. [Gr. glossa=the tongue, and anthrax=coal, charcoal; Fr. glossanthrax.]

glöss-sö-thër-i-üm, s. [Pref. glossio- (q. v.), and Gr. thërion=a wild animal.]

Palæont.: A genus of Myrmecophagidæ, found in Brazilian cave deposits.

glöss-söt-ö-mÿ, s. [Gr. glossa=the tongue, and tomë=a cutting, temnö=to cut.]

Surg.: Excision of the tongue.

glöss-sÿ, a. [Eng. gloss (2), s.; -y.]

1. Lit.: Having a smooth, lustrous surface; highly polished, shining, lustrous.

"The glossy holly loved the park."

Scott: Lord of the Isles, v. 19.

*2. Fig.: Having a fair or specious appearance; plausible.

Glo's-tër, s. [GLOUCESTER.]

glöt-tal, a. [Eng. glottis (s); -al.] Relating or pertaining to the glottis.

glöt-ta-lite, s. [From Lat. glota, glota=the Roman name of the Clyde, and Gr. lithos=stone.]

Min.: A variety of Aialcime (Brit. Mus. Catal.), or of Edingtonite (Dana). Thomson described it as occurring in white crystals, regular octahedrons, or four-sided pyramids or cubes. Found near Port Glasgow, on the Clyde.

glöt-tis, s. [Gr. glottis (see the def.), from glötta, the Attic form of glossa=the tongue.]

Anat.: The mouth of the wind-pipe. It constitutes a narrow aperture covered by the epiglottis when one holds his breath or swallows. It contributes by dilatation and contraction to the modulation of the voice. It is sometimes called the rima glottis, that is, the fissure or chink of the glottis.

glöt-tö-lög-ic, glöt-tö-lög-ic-al, adj. [Eng. glottology (y); -ic; -ical.] Pertaining or relating to glottology.

"This very teaching . . . must certainly afford a wide scope for glottologic observation and research."—Prof. Rajna, in Eighth Annual Address to Philol. Society, 1879, p. 28.

glöt-töl-ö-gist, s. [English glottology (y); -ist.] One who is devoted to the study of the science of language.

"It is in the Aryan family that the glottologist will have to receive his training for some time to come."—A. H. Sayce: Principles of Comp. Philol. (1878), p. 69.

glöt-töl-ö-gÿ, s. [Gr. glötta=the tongue, language, and logos=a discourse.] Generally used in the same sense as glossology (q. v.). Professor Sayce, however, gives a wider signification, as will be seen from the extract.

"Glottology will be the science of language, by which we are enabled to trace the gradual growth of the mind of man, whether displayed in the creation of language generally as an instrument of intercommunication, and the embodiment of the conceptions of the relations between thought and the world, or in the triumph of the will over the mechanism of the bodily organs, and the limitations imposed in turn by them upon it, or lastly in the evolution of the religious idea—in other words, in Comparative Mythology and the Science of Religions."—A. H. Sayce: Principles of Comp. Philol. (1874), p. 59.

glöut, v. i. & t. [A variant of GLOAT (q. v.).]

A. Intrans.: To look sullen or gloomy; to pout.

"Glouting with sullen spite, the fury shook Her clotted locks." Garth: Dispensary, ii. 35.

B. Trans.: To stare or gaze at.

"The same setteth himself upon a stage to be glouted upon by every evil eye."—Bible (1613), The Translators to the Reader.

glöut, s. [GLOUT, v.] A sulk, bad temper.

"My mamma was in the glout."—Richardson: Clarissa, ii. 140.

glöve, s. [A. S. glóf; Icel. glófi. Probably from Goth. lofa; Icel. lofi (Scotch loof)=the palm of the hand, with A. S. pref. ge-.]

1. A covering for the hand, differing from the mitten in having a separate compartment for each finger.

"Cicely, brisk maid, steps forth before the rout, And kissed with smacking lip the snoring lout: For custom says, 'Whoe'er this venture proves, For such a kiss demands a pair of gloves.'" Gay: Pastorals; Saturday.

2. Hatmaking: A smooth piece of wood for rubbing a sheet of felt, and causing the nap to adhere to the body when working at the battery. The glove is held in the palm of the hand, and tied on by a string.

3. Boxing: A padded casing or covering for the hands.

"Fifty years ago sparring with the gloves was regarded as a means to an end."—Saturday Review, Jan. 26, 1884, p. 108.

*¶ (1) To bite the glove: To exhibit mutual enmity or hostility.

(2) To throw down (or take up) the glove: To give (or accept) a challenge to single combat.

(3) To be hand and glove with one: To be on terms of the closest intimacy or friendship.

(4) To handle without gloves: To deal roughly, to treat without reserve or tenderness.

glove-clasp, s.

1. A band passing over the glove at the wrist to secure it.

2. An instrument with a hook at the end, used for buttoning gloves.

glove-fight, s.

Boxing: A pugilistic contest in which the men wear boxing-gloves. It is less dangerous than prize-fighting (q. v.), since the padded glove breaks the force of the blow.

"Men were being punished for engaging in glove-fights."—Saturday Review, Jan. 26, 1884, p. 108.

glove-fighter, s.

Boxing: One of the principals concerned in a glove-fight (q. v.); a promoter of glove-fighting.

"Fate has not proved so unkind to the Eltham prize-fighters, or glove-fighters, or whatever they were, as she at first threatened to be."—Referee, Feb. 10, 1884.

glove-fighting, s.

Boxing: The practice of fighting with boxing-gloves, as distinguished from prize-fighting proper.

"We have thus four different species of encounter, of which the first two—fighting and glove-fighting—are clearly prohibited."—Saturday Review, Jan. 26, 1884, p. 108.

glove-money, s.

Old Eng. Law: An extraordinary reward given to officers of courts, &c., and money given by a sheriff of a county in which no offenders were left for execution, to the clerk of assize, and the judges' officers.

glove-sponge, s.

Zoöl.: A superior and soft variety of commercial sponges. (Spongia officinalis.)

glove-stretcher, s. An instrument for opening or stretching the fingers of gloves, in order that they may be more easily be drawn on the hand.

glöve, v. t. [GLOVE, s.] To cover with or as with a glove.

"A scaly gauntlet now, with joints of steel, Must glove this hand."

Shakesp.: Henry IV., Pt. II., i. 1.

glöy-ër, s. [Eng. glöve (e), -er.] One whose business is to make or sell gloves.

"Does he not wear a great round beard like a glöyer's paring knife?"—Shakesp.: Merry Wives, i. 4.

glöyer's-stitch, s.

Surg.: A peculiar stitch employed in sewing up a wound.

glöw, glöwe, glöw-en, glöw-yn, v. i. & t.

[A. S. glöwan; cogn. with Icel. glöa; Dan. glöe; Dut. glöeyen; Ger. gluhen=to glow; Sw. glö=to stare; Sw. dial. glö, glöa=to stare; O. H. Ger. gluajan. From the same root as glad, glass, gloat, gloom, glide, glitter, glance, &c.]

A. Intransitive:

1. To be so heated as to give out an intense or white heat, without flame; to be incandescent.

"Not all parts like, but all alike inform'd With radiant light, as glowing iron with fire."

Milton: P. L., iii. 694.

2. To sparkle, to gleam.

"The circles of his eyes in his head They glöweden between yelve and red."

Chaucer: C. T., 2, 134.

3. To burn with great heat.

"From their nostrils flows The scorching fire that in their entrails glöws."

Adrian: Ovid; Metamorphoses ii.

fäte, fät, färe, amidst, whät, fäll, father, wë, wët, hère, camël, hër, thère; pine, pít, síre, sír, marine; gó, pöt, or, wöre, wolf, wörk, whö, sön; müte, cüb, cüre, unite, cür, rüle, füll; trÿ, Sÿrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

4. To feel heat of body; to be heated or hot; to burn.

"[I] felt my blood
Glow with the glow that slowly crimsoned all Thy presence." Tennyson: Tithonus, 56.

5. To assume or exhibit a strong, bright color; to be red, brilliant, or flushed, as with animation, life, blushes, &c.

"Each pleasing Blount shall endless smiles bestow,
And fair Belinda's blush for ever glow."
Pope: Epistle iii. 61.

6. To feel the heat of passion; to be ardent or eager in any passion of the mind.

"I feel my bosom glow with wantless fires."
Drummond: Hymn on the Fairest Fair

7. To rage or burn as a passion; to be vehement or hot.

"Love slowly burns and long remains;
It glows." Shadwell.

8. To be animated or spirited; to be full of spirit or life.

"And feelings, roused in life's first day, Glow in the line, and prompt the lay."
Scott: Marmion, iii. (Introd.)

*B. Trans.: To cause to glow; to make red or glowing.

glōw, *glōwe, s. [GLOW, v.]

1. A shining or white heat without flame; incandescence.

2. Brightness of color, redness; a rosy color, a flush.

"If you will see a pageant truly played Between the pale complexion of true love,
And the red glow of scorn and proud disdain,
Go hence a little, and I shall conduct you."
Shakespeare: As You Like It, iii. 4.

3. Vehemence of passion; heat of mind; excitement, earnestness, ardor.

"Such as suppose that the simple, grave, and majestic dignity of Raffaele could unite with the glow and bustle of a Paulo, or Tintoret, are totally mistaken."—Reynolds.

4. Heat of the blood produced by exercise; as, He was all in a glow after the walk.

Electric glow:

Elect.: A pale blue luminosity appearing at the parts of an electric conductor from which electricity of high tension is noiselessly issuing, even though no other conductor is near.

For the difference between glow and fire, see FIRE.

glow-worm, s.

Entomology:

1. Lampyrus noctiluca. A beetle of which the male flies and does not shine, while the female shines and does not fly. It is from the latter sex, therefore, that the name glow-worm has been derived. Probably the phosphoric light, which is intermittent, and can be displayed or withheld at the will of the insect, is used by the female to attract the male. It is displayed at the tail of the insect.

2. The genus Lampyrus (q. v.).

*glōw-bard, s. [GLOBARD.]

glōw-ēr, v. i. [Dut. gluren = to peep.] To stare; to gaze intently.

"Monkbarns was glowering ower a' the silver yonder."
—Scott: Antiquary, ch. xxiv.

glōw-ēr, s. [GLOWER, v.] A broad stare; an intense gazing.

glōw-ing, pr. par., a. & s. [GLOW, v.]

A. As pr. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As adjective:

1. Shining with a white heat without flame; incandescent; white with heat.

2. Bright or vivid in color; brilliant.

"Till Autumn's fiercer heats and plementous dews Dye them at last in all their glowing hues."
Comper: Tirocinum, 48.

3. Red, rosy, or flushed; as, glowing cheeks.

4. Ardent; animated; full of life, spirit, or animation.

"The lucid amber of his glowing lines."—Walpole: Anecdotes of Painting, vol. iv, ch. i.

5. Hot, heated, fervid.

6. Full of praise or admiration; as, a glowing description.

C. As substantive:

1. A glow; a white heat; incandescence.

2. Ardor, zeal, animation.

"The inward glowings of a heart in love."
Addison: Cato, iv. 1.

glōw-ing-lȳ, adv. [Eng. glowing; -ly.] In a glowing manner; with great heat or brightness; with heat or passion.

glōx-in-ȳ, s. [Named after P. B. Gloxin, a botanist of Colmar, Alsace, Germany, in the eighteenth century.]

Bot.: A genus of Gesneraceae, having a bell-shaped corolla, the upper lip the shorter one, and two-lobed, the lower one three-lobed, with the middle lobe the largest. The species are from tropical America, and are very ornamental plants, having richly-colored leaves, as well as fine white, violet, red, or greenish yellow flowers, occasionally variegated with spots.

*glōze (1), v. t. & i. [Icel. glósa = to explain; A. S. glésan = to explain, to flatter; Sp. glossar; Port. glossar; Fr. glosser.] [GLOSE, GLOSS.]

A. Transitive:

1. To explain by note or comment; to gloss.

2. To flatter; to wheedle.

B. Intransitive:

1. To comment; to expound.

2. To flatter.

glōze (2), v. i. [Icel. glóssi = a blaze.] To blaze.

glōze, s. [GLOZE, v.]

1. Flattery, wheedling, adulation.

2. Specious, external show.

"Now to plain dealing; lay these glōzes by."

Shakespeare: Love's Labor's Lost, iv. 3.

*glōz-ēr, *glōg-ēr, s. [Eng. glöz (e) (1), v.; -er.]

1. A glosser; a commentator or annotator.

2. A flatterer; a wheedler.

*glūb, v. t. [A variant of GULP (q. v.).] To gulp down or swallow voraciously.

*glūb-bēr, s. [English glub; -er.] A glutton; a gormandizer.

glū-gīc, a. [Eng., &c., gluc (ose); suff. -ic.]

Chem.: Contained in, derived from, or in any manner connected with Glucose (q. v.).

glucic-acid, s.

Chem.: $C_12H_{22}O_{12}$. An acid obtained along with saccharum acid, by boiling cane sugar with dilute sulphuric acid; by boiling glucose with baryta water, the precipitate of the barium salt of saccharum acid is filtered off, and the glucic acid precipitated by means of basic lead acetate, and the lead salt decomposed by H_2S . Glucic acid is a honey-like mass easily soluble in alcohol and water; it is decomposed by boiling with water, or with dilute acids into formic, acetic, and apogluconic acids. When boiled with strong acids it is converted into humic acid; some chemists consider this acid to be identical with levulinic acid (q. v.).

glū-gī-na, s. [Gr. glukus = sweet.]

Chem.: Oxide of beryllium (q. v.).

glū-gīn-ic, a. [English, &c., gluc (ose); -inic.] [GLUCIC.]

glū-gīn-ūm, s. [Gr. glukus = sweet.]

Chem.: A metallic element. [BERYLLIUM.] The salts of glucinum have a sweet taste, hence the name.

glū-cōn-ic, a. [Eng., &c., gluco (se), n connective, and suff. -ic.]

Chem.: (For def. see etym. and compound.)

gluconic-acid, s.

Chem.: $C_6H_{12}O_7$. An organic acid obtained by the oxidation of glucose with chlorine, or with bromine. Gluconic acid is a syrup; its alkaline salts are amorphous, and its barium and calcium salts are crystalline. It is insoluble in strong alcohol, and does not reduce Fehling's solution.

glū-cō-san, s. [English, &c., glucos (e), and an- (hydrate) (q. v.).]

Chem.: $C_6H_{12}O_5$. The anhydride of glucose. Obtained by heating glucose to 170° . Glucosan is colorless, with a faint, sweet taste; it is soluble in water and in alcohol; it does not ferment with yeast. By the action of dilute acids, glucosan is converted into glucose.

glū-cōse, s. [Gr. glukus = sweet.]

Chem.: Glucose, glycose, $C_6H_{12}O_6$. A fermentable sugar, which occurs in two modifications, called Dextro-glucose, or Dextrose (q. v.), and Lævo-glucose, or Levulose (q. v.), according as it turns the plane of polarization to the right or left. A solution of cane-sugar warmed with dilute acids, or left in contact with yeast, is converted into dextrose and levulose, $C_{12}H_{22}O_{11} + H_2O = C_6H_{12}O_6 + C_6H_{12}O_6$. These modifications can be separated, thus—ten parts of the mixture of sugar are dissolved in 100 parts of water, and cooled with ice; then six parts of powdered calcium hydrate are added, the calcium compound of levulose is precipitated and separated from the soluble calcium compound of dextrose by strong pressure, washed, and decomposed by carbonic-acid gas. Levulose is more soluble in alcohol than dextrose. Both dextrose and levulose in contact with yeast undergo vinous fermentation, and when added to a solution of cupric sulphate, rendered alkaline by caustic potash, gives a dark-blue solution, which, when boiled, is reduced, cuprous oxide being precipitated as a red powder.

glū-cō-side, s. [Eng., &c., glucos (e) (q. v.); ide.]

Chem.: A name given to compounds which occur naturally in plants from which they are extracted by water, or by alcohol; they cannot be melted without decomposition, and are resolved by boiling with dilute acids into a saccharine substance, as glucose, and another substance which has generally neutral properties. The glucoside can be obtained from the aqueous or alcoholic extract of the plant, by precipitating the other substances by lead acetate, treating the filtrate with H_2S gas, and evaporating the filtrate. Glucosides are mostly solid and crystalline substances. They give a red color when heated to 70° , with a dilute solution of gall, and a little concentrated sulphuric acid. [PHLOBOGLUCIDE, GUMMIDES, MANNIDES.]

glū-cōs-ūr-ī-a, s. [Greek glukus = sweet, and ouron = urine.]

Pathol.: A form of diabetes (q. v.). The name has reference to the fact that the urine of persons affected with this disease contains sugar.

glūe, *glū, *glew, *glewe, s. [O. Fr. glu, from Low Lat. glutem, accus. of glus = glue. Allied to Lat. gluten, glutinum = glue, from a verb gluo* = to draw together.]

I. Literally:

1. A viscous substance made of the chippings of hides, horns, and hoofs, which are washed in lime-water, boiled, skimmed, strained, evaporated, cooled in molds, cut into slices, and dried upon nets.

"Great cunning there is in making strong glue, and in the feat of joining with it."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. xvi, ch. xliii.

2. Any sticky or viscous substance.

"For what glue or cement holds the parts of hard matter in stones and metals together."—H. More: Immortality of the Soul, bk. i, ch. vii.

*II. Fig.: Any means or cause which unites or tends to unite bodies; a source of union; a link.

"The body of priests is copious, being joined together by the glue of mutual concord, and the bond of unity."—Barrow: Of the Pope's Supremacy.

¶ (1) White fish-glue, or diamond cement, is made of isinglass dissolved in alcohol.

(2) Marine glue of shellac and caoutchouc, equal parts, dissolved in separate portions of naphtha, and then mixed.

(3) Isinglass glue, of isinglass soaked in cold water; when swelled, put in spirits of wine; heated in a bottle plunged in a bath, with powdered chalk added.

(4) Waterproof-glue, of two ounces of isinglass boiled in a pint of skim-milk, until the requisite consistence is obtained.

glue-boiler, s.

1. A convenient apparatus for boiling skins into glue.

2. One whose business or trade is to make glue.

glue-can, s. [GLUE-POT.]

glue-cement, s. A cement to resist moisture. It is made of glue, 4 parts; black resin, 4 parts; red ochre, 1 part. Or, glue, 4 parts; boiled oil, 1 part; oxide of iron, 1 part.

glue-dryer, s. A machine or closet for drying sheets of glue.

glue-plant, s.

Bot.: Plocaria tenax, a fucoid sea-weed.

glue-pot, s. A can or pot with a can to hold the glue, which is melted by the heat of the water in the outer vessel.

"Heart, what dost thou with such a greasy dish? I think thou dost varnish thy face with the fat on't, it looks so like a glue-pot."—Ben Jonson: Every Man out of his Humor, v. 6.

glūe, *glēw, *glwȳn, v. t. & i. [GLUE, s.]

A. Transitive:

1. Lit.: To join or unite with glue, or other viscous substance.

"Their bowes are of wood of a yard long, sinewed at the back with strong sinews, not glued too, but fast girded and tied on."—Hackluyt: Voyages, lii. 37.

II. Figuratively:

1. To unite; to join closely.

"Their armies ioynt in slaughters vile together glued."
Phaer: Virgil's Æneidos vii.

2. To join, to fix, to rivet, to attach.

*B. Intrans.: To become firmly or closely united, fixed, or attached. (Thomson: Winter, 834.)

glūed, *glēwed, pr. par. or a. [GLUE, v.]

glū-e-ing, pr. par., a. & s. [GLUING.]

glū-ēr, s. [Eng. glu (e); -er.] One who or that which glues or cements; one who cements with glue.

bōil, bōȳ; pōut, jōwī; cat, cēll, chorus, chīn, bench; go, gēm; thin, thīs; sin, aȳ; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f
-cian, -tian = shān. -tion, -sion = shūn; -tīon, -sīon = zhūn. -tious, -cious, -sious = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl.

glū-ey, glew-ey, glew-ie, gluw-y, glu-y, a. [Eng. glue; -y.] Of the nature of glue; resembling glue; viscous, tenacious, glutinous.

"And to the end the golde may cover them, they anoynt their bodies with stamped herbs of a glewey substance."—Hackluyt: Voyages, iii, 665.

glū-ey-nēss, s. [Eng. gluey; -ness.] The quality or state of being gluey.

glūg, s. [Etym. doubtful.] A clod; a lump.

glū-ing, glū-e-ing, glu-ynge, pr. par., a. & s. [GLUE, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act or process of cementing or uniting with glue; the act of uniting or attaching closely and firmly.

glueing-machine, s. A machine for smearing upon an applied surface a thin and even coating of liquid glue.

glueing-press, s. A contrivance to hold firmly together a number of parts which have been attached by glue or cement.

glū-ish, glew-ishe, a. [English glu(e); -ish.] Having the nature of glue; gluey, glutinous.

"And consequently be fit for the souls of the deceased to have recourse to, and replenish their vehicle with such a cambium or gluish moisture, as will make it far easier to be commanded into a visible consistence."—H. More: Immortality of the Soul, bk. ii, ch. xvi.

glūm, v. i. [Sw. dial. glomma=to stare; connected with Sw. glomug=gloomy, and Eng. gloom (q. v.).] (Skeat.) [GLOMBE.] To look sullen or gloomy; to gloom.

glūm, glumme, a. & s. [GLUM, v.]

A. As adj.: Sullen, frowning, gloomy.
"Thou shouldste not take me vp with visage sad and glum."—Drant: Horace; Ep. to Julius Florus.

B. As substantive:

1. Sullenness, gloominess.

2. A frown; a sullen, gloomy, or frowning look.

"She looked hautely, and gaue me a glum."—Skelton: Crowne of Laurell.

glū-mā, s. [GLUME.]

gluma-exterior, gluma-calycinalis, s.

Bot.: The same as GLUME (q. v.).

gluma-interior, gluma-corollina, s.

Bot.: The same as GLUMELLA (q. v.).

glū-mā-cē-ōis (or ceous as shūs), a. [Eng. &c., glum(e) (q. v.)-aceous.]

Bot.: Possessed of glumes resembling the flowers of grasses.

glū-mal, a. [Mod. Lat. glumalis.]

Bot.: Of, belonging to, or characterized by the possession of a glume; pertaining or relating to the Glumales (q. v.).

Bot.: The English name given by Lindley to the alliance Glumales (q. v.).

glū-mā-lēs, s. pl. [Masc. or fem. pl. of Mod. Lat. glumalis, from Class. Lat. gluma (q. v.).]

Bot.: The Glumal Alliance. It consists of Endogens possessed of glumes. [GLUME.] Lindley placed under it the orders Graminaceæ, Cyperaceæ, Desvauziaceæ, Restiaceæ, and Eriocaulaceæ.

glūme, glū-mā, s. [Lat. gluma = a hull or husk, especially of corn; glubo = to deprive of bark, to peel.]

Bot.: The exterior series of scales constituting the flower of a grass. It consists of empty bracts. The name was given by Linnaeus, and adopted by Lindley.

Locusta of Oat. (Avena sativa.)
gl. Glumes.

glū-mēl-lā, s. [Fem. dimin. from Lat. gluma (q. v.).]

Bot.: One of the names given by De Candolle and Desvauz to two bracts within the glumes of a grass; the other name being pale. In one of the bracts the midrib quits the blade a little below the apex, and is elongated into an awn, arista, or beard, while the other bract which faces the fruit has its back to the rachis, is bifid at the apex, has no dorsal veins, and has a rib on each side of its inflexed edges. These two bracts are called by Linnaeus the corolla of the grass, by Jussieu the calyx, by Robert Brown the perianth, and by Lindley and others its paleæ.

glū-mēl-lū-lā, s. [Fem. dimin. of glumella, which again is a dimin. of gluma (q. v.).]

Bot.: The name given by Desvauz and De Candolle to either of two minute colorless, sometimes connate, hypogynous scales within the glumes of grass. They are the nectarium of Linnaeus, the corolla of Micheli and Dumortier, the squamule (scales) of Jussieu, Brown, and Lindley.

glū-mif-ēr-æ, s. pl. [Latin gluma=a glume; fero=to bear, to produce, to bring forth, and Lat. fem. pl. suff. -æ.]

Bot.: The same as GLUMALES (q. v.).

glū-mif-ēr-ōus, a. [Latin gluma=a glume; fero=to bear, to produce, to bring forth, and Eng. adj. suff. -ous.]

Bot.: Of or pertaining to the Glumiferae; bearing glumes.

glūm-mish, a. [Eng. glum; -ish.] Dark, gloomy, dismal.

With glumtish darkish shade bespreds the same."
Phaer: Virgil's Aeneid xi.

glūm-mý, a. [Eng. glum; -y.] Dark, gloomy, dismal.

"Such casual blasts may happen, as are most to be feared, when the weather waxeth dark and glummy."—Knight: Trial of Truth (1890), fo. 27.

glūm-nēss, s. [Eng. glum; -ness.] The quality or state of being glum; gloominess, sullenness.

glū-mōus, a. [Eng. glum(e); -ous.]

Bot.: Having a filiform receptacle, with a common glume at the base.

glūmp, v. i. [GLUM, a.] To look sulky or sullen; to show sullenness in one's manner.

glūmp-y, a. [Eng. glump; -y.] Glum, sullen, sulky.

glūnch, a. & s. [Etym. doubtful.]

A. As adj.: Frowning, gloomy, sulky, sullen.

"But what's the use of looking sae glum and glunch about a pickle banes?"—Scott: Antiquary, ch. ix.

B. As subst.: A sullen, angry look; a frown; a look of disdain, anger, or dislike.

glūt, v. i. & t. [Lat. glutio, gluttio=to swallow, to gulp down, from the same root as gula=the throat.]

A. Transitive:

*1. To swallow, to gulp down.

*2. To swallow up, to engulf.

"He'll be hanged yet, Though every drop of water swear against it, And gape at wid'st to glut him."—Shakespeare: Tempest, i. 1.

3. To cloy; to fill up beyond sufficiency; to sate, to disgust.

"Is this your fate, to glut the dogs with gore?"—Pope: Homer's Iliad, xi, 950.

4. To feast or delight to satiety; to satiate.

"Go glut thy eyes with thy adored Ismena."—Smith: Phœdra and Hippotitus, iii.

*5. To saturate.

"The menstruum, being already glutted, could not act powerfully enough to dissolve it."—Boyle.

6. To overfill, to load; to fill with an over-supply of anything.

B. Intrans.: To feast, to eat to satiety.

"Like three horses that have broken fence, And glutted all night long breast-deep in corn, We issue gorged with knowledge."—Tennyson: Princess, ii, 365.

glūt, s. [GLUT, v.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. That which is swallowed.

"Deep-throated engines . . . disgorging foul Their devilish glūt."—Milton: P. L., vi, 589.

2. Plenty, even to loathing or disgust.

3. More than enough, overmuch, a superabundance.

"An abundance, indeed a glut, of those talents which raise men to eminence in societies torn by internal factions."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xi.

*4. Anything which fills up or obstructs a passage.

"The water some suppose to pass from the bottom of the sea to the heads of springs, through certain subterranean conduits or channels, until they were, by some glut, stopped, or, by other means, arrested in their passage."—Woodward.

5. A wooden wedge used as a quoin, a chock in splitting timber, or as a fulcrum to a lever.

II. Technically:

1. Arch.: An arched opening to the ash-pit of a kiln.

"The fireplaces . . . consist of mere rectangular brick chambers, with an orifice at the top for supplying the fuel, and an arched opening to the ash-pit, the arch itself being called the glut."—G. N. Redgrave, in Cassell's Technical Educator, pt. x, p. 206.

2. Bricklaying: A small brick or block introduced into a course to complete it.

3. Comm.: An oversupply of any commodity in the market; a supply beyond the demand.

4. Nautical:

(1) A patch at the center of the head of a sail, having an eyelet for the becket-rope.

(2) A choking, as by throwing the fall of a rope across the sheaves.

glut-brick, s. [The same as GLUT, II. 2 (q. v.).]

"The fire is prevented from falling out of the fire-hole by means of a rough open wall of brickbats called the glut-bricks."—G. H. Redgrave, in Cassell's Technical Educator, pt. x, p. 206.

glū-tō-ūs, s. [GLUTEUS.]

glū-tām-āte, s. [Eng. glutam(ic); -ate.]

Chem.: A salt of glutamic acid (q. v.).

glū-tām-īc, a. [Eng. &c., glut(en), and amic, an acid containing the radical (NH₂).] For def. see compound.

glutamic-acid, s.

Chemistry: Glutamic acid, amido-glutaric acid C₆H₇(NH₂)O₄, or CH₂(CH(NH₂)CO²OH). Obtained by boiling vegetable gluten with dilute sulphuric acid, or casein with hydrochloric acid and stannous chloride. It is best prepared by boiling the gluten with 82 per cent. alcohol, which extracts the mucin, and boiling for twenty-four hours, with an inverted condenser, one part of the mucin with three parts of sulphuric acid and six parts of water; it is then filtered, saturated with chalk, filtered and evaporated to one-third of its bulk; the calcium salt is decomposed by oxalic acid, the excess of oxalic acid is removed by carbonate of lead, and the excess of PbCO₃ by H₂S gas, and the filtrate evaporated, tyrosin crystallizes out, and afterward the glutamic acid, which crystallizes out of hot water in tetrahedral crystals, which are nearly insoluble in alcohol and in ether, melt with partial decomposition at 140°.

Glutamic acid forms crystalline compounds with acids, and also forms salts. The barium salt gives characteristic needle groups like Wawellit.

glū-tān-āte, s. [Eng. glutan(ic); -ate.]

Chem.: A salt of glutanic acid (q. v.).

glū-tān-īc, a. [Eng. gluta(nic); n connective; -ic.] For def. see compound.

glutanic-acid, s.

Chemical: Oxyglutaric acid, Unsymmetrical hydroxypyrotartaric acid.

C₅H₆O₅ or CH(OH)·CO²OH

(H₂

CH₂·CO²OH.

Obtained by passing nitrous gas into a solution of glutamic acid in nitric acid, or by acting on a dilute solution of glutamic acid in hydrochloric acid by potassium nitrite, evaporating on a water bath and slaking out with ether. It forms small crystals, which melt at 72°. When heated to 190°, the anhydride is formed. Heated with hydriodic acid to 120°, glutanic acid is reduced to normal pyrotartaric acid. Glutanic acid forms crystalline salts, called glutanates, which are only slightly soluble in cold water.

glū-tār-āte, s. [Eng. glutar(ic), and suff. -ate.]

Chem.: A salt of glutaric acid (q. v.).

glū-tār-īc, a. [Eng. gluta(mic); r connective; -ic.] For def. see compound.

glutaric-acid, s.

Chem.: Normal pyrotartaric acid, C₆H₆O₄ or HO²OC·CH₂·(CH₂)₂·CO²OH. Obtained by heating glutanic acid with hydriodic acid to 120°; or by boiling for four hours one volume of normal propylene cyanide CH₂·(CH₂)₂·CN₂ with a volume and a half of fuming hydrochloric acid, evaporating on a water bath and extracting with absolute alcohol; or by treating ethyl sodacetate with ethylic Beta iodopropionate, and decomposing the resulting ethylic aceto-glutanate with concentrated alcoholic potash. Glutaric acid crystallizes out of water in large transparent monoclinic prisms, which melt at 97.5, and distill at 304°; it is easily soluble in water, alcohol, and in ether. It forms crystalline salts called glutarates.

Glutaric anhydride, C₅H₆O₃, is obtained by the action of acetyl chloride on the silver salt, or by slowly heating the acid at 230° to 280°. It forms fine needles, which melt at 56°, and are only slightly soluble in cold ether.

glū-tē-āl, a. [Lat. gluteus (pl. glutei); English, &c., suff. -al.]

Anat.: Pertaining to the muscles called glutei, or to the buttock. Thus there is a gluteal artery as well as an inferior and a superior gluteal nerve.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāl, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pēt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, wōh, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fāl; trȳ, Sȳrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

glû-tên, s. [Lat.]

Chem.: An albuminous substance, obtained by mixing ten parts of wheat-meal with eight parts of water, and allowing it to stand for half an hour; it is then washed with water, and kneaded, till all the starch is washed away, and the gluten thus obtained is a tenacious, yellowish-gray, elastic mass, which dries into a horny, semi-transparent mass, resembling glue. Gluten is soluble in dilute acids, but is nearly insoluble in water. Moist gluten putrefies when exposed to the air, unless it is quickly dried. Gluten is partly soluble in 80 per cent. alcohol; the portion insoluble in alcohol is called vegetable fibrin. The alcoholic solution contains mucin and gluten, or vegetable gelatine (q. v.).

gluten-bread, s. Bread containing a large quantity of gluten. It has been largely used in diabetes, but few people are able to eat it for any length of time.

glut-er-nes, *glut-err-nesse, s. [Icel. glutr=voracious.] Glutinous.

glû-tê-ús, *glû-tê-ús (pl. glû-tê-l), s. [Gr. glutos=the buttock.]

Anat. (pl.): Three muscles of the hip, the Gluteus maximus, the gluteus medius, and the gluteus minimus. The first is a very large and coarsely fasciculated muscle, which makes the buttock prominent in man; its use is to extend the thigh. The second is smaller; it is partly covered by the muscle already mentioned, and acts when one stands. The third is the smallest; it is covered by the second one, and acts as an abductor of the thigh.

glû-tin, glû-tîne, s. [Eng., &c., glut(en); -in, -ine.]

Chem.: Vegetable gelatine. Obtained along with mucin by heating gluten in small fragments, with alcohol of 80 per cent., and then with alcohol of 70 per cent.; the alcoholic solutions are united, and the half of the alcohol distilled off. On cooling it deposits a mixture of gluten and mucin. The deposit is dissolved in 50 per cent. alcohol, and filtered through calico while hot, and then agitated till it is cold; most of the mucin is precipitated, the filtered liquid is evaporated in a water bath, and the gluten dissolved in alcohol. Gluten containing water is a fluid resembling a yellow varnish. Absolute alcohol precipitates it as a solid yellow-white substance, which can be dried over sulphuric acid; when rubbed dry, gluten becomes electric. Gluten is soluble in alkalies, and in dilute hydrochloric acid, and acetic acid. The chemical formula of gluten is not known. The analysis gave: Carbon 52.7, hydrogen 7.1, nitrogen 18.0, and sulphur 0.9 per cent.

glû-tin-âte, v. t. [Lat. glutinatus, pa. par. of glutino=to cement; gluten (genit. glutinis)=glue.] To cement or unite with glue; to glue.

glû-tin-â-tion, s. [Lat. glutinatio, from glutinatus, pa. par. of glutino=to glue, to cement.] The act or process of cementing or uniting with glue.

glû-tin-â-tive, a. [Eng. glutinativ(e); -ive; Fr. glutinatif; Ital. glutinativo.] Having the quality of cementing; glutinous; viscous.

glû-tine, s. [GLUTIN.]

glû-tin-ing, a. [Lat. glutin(o)=to glue, to cement; suff. -ing.] Glutinous, viscid, cementing.

"Leaving an aquatic and viscous glutining kind of sweat upon the glass."—Digby: Of the Sympathetic Powder.

glû-tin-î-um, s. [Lat.=gluten.]

Bot.: The flesh of certain fungals. (Treas. of Bot.)

glû-tin-ôs-i-ty, *glu-tin-ôs-i-tie, s. [French glutinosité; Sp. glutinosidad; Ital. glutinosità, from Lat. glutinosus=glutinous.] The quality or state of being glutinous; glutinousness.

glû-tin-ôs, a. [Lat. glutinosus, from glutinum=glue; Fr. glutineux; Sp., Port. & Ital. glutinoso.] 1. Ord. Lang.: Viscous; viscid; gluey; tenacious; having the quality of or resembling glue.

"All these threads, being newly spun, are glutinous, and, therefore, stick to each other whenever they happen to touch."—Goldsmith: The Bee, iv.

2. Bot.: Viscid, glutinous, adhesive, gluey, covered with a sticky exudation.

glû-tin-ôs-ness, s. [Eng. glutinous; -ness.] The quality or state of being glutinous; glutinosity; viscousness.

glûts, s. [GLUT, s.] A local name in Oxfordshire, England, for the broad-nosed eel (Anguilla latirostris).

glût-tîng, pr. par., a. & s. [GLUT, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of swallowing greedily, or gungling down food.

"Glutting of meals which weakeneth the body."—Sir J. Cheeke: The Hurt of Sedition.

glût-tôn, *glot-on, *glot-one, *glot-oun, *glut-on, *glut-ten, s. & a. [O. Fr. gloton (Fr. glouton), from Lat. glutonem, accus. of gluto=a glutton, from glutio=to devour, to gulp down; Sp. gloton; Port. glotão; Ital. gluotone.]

A. As substantive:

1. Ordinary Language:

1. One who indulges in eating or drinking to excess; a gormandizer; one who gorges himself with food.

2. One who indulges in or is eager for anything in excess.

"Gluttons in murder, wanton to destroy,
Their fatal hearts so impiously employ."
Granville.

*3. A wretch; an epithet of contempt and disgust.

"A gloton, saide the emperer, entrepre thou beter thy tongue!"
Sir Ferumbras, 164.

II. Technically:

1. Zool.: The popular name for the Wolverine or Wolverine (Gulo luscus), a carnivorous mammal of the family Meliidae (Badgers). It is a voracious animal, but not quite meriting the stigma of being called a glutton. The calumny seems to have been first circulated by Olaus Magnus, Buffon following in his train. The English residents at Hudson's Bay call it Quickehatch, or what Catesby and Ellis spell Quickhatch, and Graham Quikihatch. Its length is from two to three feet. It occurs in high latitudes in Europe, Asia, and in this country. Its motions are slow, but it manages to feed on mice, marmots, and other rodents, and, when it can obtain them, on larger quadrupeds, alive or dead. Its fur is of little value. When caught it emits an insupportable stench. Its footprints in the snow resemble those of a young bear. [GLULO, WOLVERENE.]

2. Palæont.: In 1871 Prof. Boyd Dawkins intimated the discovery of the glutton in Galtfaenan Cave, near Cefn, St. Asaph, in deposits "of the pleistocene or quaternary age." It has since been found in the Norfolk Forest bed.

B. As adj.: Pertaining to or resembling a glutton; gluttonous.

*glût-tôn, v. i. & t. [GLUTTON, s.]

A. Intrans.: To act like a glutton; to gluttonize; to gormandize.

B. Trans.: To overfill; to glut.

"Gluttoned at last, return at home to pine."

Lovelace: Lucastra Posthuma, p. 81.

*glût-tôn-ish, a. [Eng. glutton; -ish.] Like a glutton; gluttonous.

"Having now framed their gluttonish stomachs to have for food the wild benefits of nature."—Sidney: Arcadia, bk. iv.

*glût-tôn-ize, v. i. [Eng. glutton; -ize.] To eat as a glutton; to eat to excess.

"What reason can you allege why you should gluttonize and devour as much as would honestly suffice so many of your brethren?"—Marvell: Works, ii. 335.

*glût-tôn-ly, *glut-oun-liche, adv. [English glutton; -ly.] Like a glutton; gluttonously, voraciously.

glût-tôn-ôs, *glot-on-ous, a. [Eng. glutton; -ous.]

1. Given to gluttony or excess in eating and drinking; indulging the appetite to excess; insatiable.

2. Characterized by gluttony or excess.

"And wantonness, and gluttonous excess,"

Cowper: Task, l. 688.

glût-tôn-ôs-ly, *glou-ton-ous-ly, adv. [Eng. gluttonous; -ly.] In a gluttonous manner; like a glutton; voraciously; insatiably.

*glût-tôn-ôs-ness, s. [Eng. gluttonous; -ness.] The quality or state of being gluttonous; gluttony; insatiable rapacity. (Lit. & fig.)

"Penny-a-lining gluttonousness is doing a great deal of harm."—London Echo.

*glût-tôn-ry, *glu-ten-er-ie, s. [Eng. glutton; -ry.] Gluttony.

glût-tôn-y, *glot-on-ic, *glot-on-y, *glot-on-ye, *glot-en-y, *glot-un-ye, s. [O. Fr. glotonie, gloutonnie; Fr. gloutonnie.] Excess in eating or drinking; excessive or extravagant indulgence of the appetite for food; voracity; gormandizing.

"Their sumptuous gluttonies and gorgeous feasts," Milton: P. R., iv. 114.

glû-y, a. [GLUEY.]

glÿc-êr-als, s. pl. [Eng., &c., glycer(in), and *aldehyde*s.]

Chem.: Compounds analogous to acetals, obtained by heating glycerin with aldehydes for thirty hours at a temperature of 170° to 180°; as aceto-glycerale, (C₅H₁₀O₃). It boils at 184°.

glÿc-êr-âm-ic, a. [Eng., &c., glycer(in), and amic.] (For def. see etym. and compound.)

glyceramic-acid, s.

Chem.: Serin, C₃H₇NO₃ or C₃H₅(OH)·NH₂·CO₂H. A monobasic, triatomic, amido-acid, obtained by boiling silk with water and evaporating the filtered solution, adding a quarter of its volume of sulphuric acid, and boiling for twenty-four hours; then it is neutralized with excess of calcium hydrate, the filtrate is evaporated and a little H₂SO₄ added to neutralize it. Tyrosin and calcium sulphate first separate out on evaporation, then serin, and lastly a little leucin. The serin is dissolved in 40 parts of cold water, filtered, the filtrate neutralized by ammonia, and the calcium salt is then decomposed by carbon dioxide. It forms monoclinic crystals dissolving in 24 parts of water at 20°. It is insoluble in alcohol and in ether. It forms crystalline compounds with acids and with bases.

glÿ-gêr-a-mine, s. [Eng., &c., glycer(ine), and amine.]

Chem.: C₃H₉NO₃ or CH₃(OH)·CH(OH)·CH₂·NH₂. A base obtained by passing ammonia gas into a solution of dibromhydrin C₃H₅Br₂ in absolute alcohol. Glyceramine is a liquid soluble in water and in ether.

glÿc-êr-âte, s. [Eng., &c., glycer(in); -ate.]

Chem.: A salt of glyceric acid (q. v.).

glÿ-gêr-î-a, s. [Gr. glykeros=sweet, in allusion to the sweetness of the grain.]

Bot.: Manna grass, a genus of grasses, tribe Festuceae, family Bromideae. The glumes are convex, five to seven nerved, the tip acute or obtuse.

glÿc-êr-ic, a. [Eng., &c., glycer(in); -ic.] Contained in or prepared from glycerine (q. v.).

"The flower is dipped in glyceric liquid so as to receive films in the petals and the central part."—London Times.

glyceric-acid, s.

Chem.: C₃H₅O₄ or CH₃(OH)·CH(OH)·CO₂H. A thick syrup, obtained by the slow action of fuming nitric acid on glycerin, the two liquids being separated by a layer of water; it is soluble in alcohol and in water. When boiled with concentrated caustic potash, it yields oxalic acid and lactic acid. When fused with caustic potash it is decomposed, acetate and formate of potassium being formed; by the action of concentrated hydriodic acid it yields beta iodopropionic acid. By the action of PCl₅ it is converted into dichloropropionyl chloride, CH₂Cl·CHCl·CO₂Cl. Glyceric-acid yields crystalline salts called glycerates. Glyceric-acid heated to 105° for ten hours yields an anhydride which crystallizes out of water in thin needles, which are insoluble in cold alcohol. They decompose at 250° without melting.

glÿc-êr-ide, s. [Eng., &c., glycer(in); -ide.]

Chem.: A name given to ethers of the triatomic alcohol glycerol, C₃H₅(OH)₃. They have generally the termination -in. One, two, or three hydroxyls (OH) can be replaced by acid radicals. Thus acetic acid forms with glycerin ethers called acetins. One molecule of acetic acid + one molecule of glycerol yields mono-acetin + H₂O. Two molecules of acetic acid and one molecule of glycerol yield di-acetin + 2H₂O, and three molecules of acetic acid and one molecule of glycerol yield tri-acetin + 3H₂O. Glycerides occur in the fat of animals as tri-stearin, C₃H₅(OC₁₈H₃₃O₂)₃, and in vegetable fixed oils, as tri-olein, C₃H₅(OC₁₈H₃₃O₂)₃, &c. Glycerides are insoluble in water, slightly soluble in alcohol, and more soluble in ether. Glycerides are saponified by heating them with alkalies, with calcium oxide, or lead oxide, yielding glycerin and salts of the respective acids. [FATS, OILS.] Glycerides are also decomposed into their acids and glycerin by distillation in a current of steam, the temperature being kept between 550° and 600° F. Mixed ethers of glycerin and alcoholic radicals are obtained by heating mono- and di-chlorhydrine with sodium alcoholates.

glÿc-êr-in, glÿc-êr-ine, s. [Greek glykeros, glykus=sweet; -in, -ine.]

1. Chem. & Comm.: A triatomic alcohol of the fatty series, more properly called glycerol (q. v.), C₃H₅O₃, or CH₂(OH)·CH(OH)·CH₂(OH). Glycerin was discovered in 1778 by Scheele, who obtained it in the preparation of lead-plaster by saponifying lard with oxide of lead. Glycerin occurs in most natural animal and vegetable fats in combination with fatty acids, from which it can be obtained by saponifying with alkalies. (PREPARATION OF SOAP.) It is also formed during the alcoholic fermentation of sugar. Pure glycerin is obtained by heating neutral fats in a still, with a condensing apparatus, and passing steam in small jets through the melted fat, the temperature being kept below 600° F., and above 550° F.; the fat acids separate out in the receivers from the glycerin and water; the glycerin is then concentrated by evaporation. Glycerin is a thick, colorless, inodorous, neutral syrup, which has a very sweet taste; it mixes with water in all proportions, is soluble in alcohol and in chloroform, but insoluble in ether. It can be obtained by freezing, in deliquescent rhombic crystals, which melt at 17°. Glycerin boils at 290°; it is very hygroscopic; heated to 150° it burns with a bluish flame. Glycerin dissolves iodine and many metallic oxides and salts, also salts of the alkalis. The specific gravity of glycerin is 1.26 at 15°, compared with water at 4°. Glycerin distilled with phosphorous pentachloride, P_2Cl_5 , yields acrolein. By the action of a mixture of equal parts of concentrated nitric acid and sulphuric acid, it is converted into nitroglycerin, $CH_2O(NO_2) \cdot CH(O(NO_2)) \cdot CH_2O(NO_2)$ (q. v.). Glycerin is used for preserving fruits, &c.; also as a solvent for various salts, and in preparing copying-ink; also as a lubricator for machinery and clockwork, and is placed over water in gas-meters to prevent freezing, and is used for filling floating compasses. It is employed in the form of nitroglycerin in the preparation of dynamite, and for mixing with soap to form glycerin soap, which tends to soften the skin. Glycerin is often used to adulterate wine, beer, milk, &c. Its presence can be detected by evaporating the liquid to dryness on a water-bath, and extracting the residue with alcohol; the alcoholic solution is then evaporated and caustic soda added till it is slightly alkaline; a little of this solution placed on a watch glass and powdered borax added, glycerin, if present, will set free the boric acid, which gives a characteristic green color when introduced into a flame on a platinum wire.

2. Phar.: Glycerin is used in the preparation of Glycerinum acidi carbolici, glycerin of carbolic acid; Glycerinum acidi gallici, glycerin of gallic acid; Glycerinum acidi tannici, glycerin of tannic acid, in which four fluid ounces of glycerin are mixed with one ounce of the acid; Glycerinum amyli, glycerin of starch; Glycerinum boracis, glycerin of borax. These compounds are called glycerina or glycerines. Glycerin is used on account of its physical properties as an adjunct to lotions in skin diseases to prevent the surface becoming dry. It can be used as a substitute for sugar in the diet of diabetic patients. It is often adulterated with glucose and cane sugar, which can be detected by expelling the water by heat, and treating with chloroform, which dissolves the glycerin and leaves the sugar as an insoluble residue.

glyc-ër-ite, s. A medicinal preparation formed by mixing or dissolving a substance with glycerine.

glyc-ër-i-zine, s. [GLYCERHIZIN.]

glyc-ër-öl, s. [English, &c., glycer(in), and (alcohol) (q. v.).]

Chem.: The chemical name for glycerine (q. v.).

Synthesis of Glycerol: Acetone, $CH_3 \cdot CO \cdot CH_3$, is converted into isopropyl alcohol, $CH_3 \cdot CH(OH) \cdot CH_3$, by the action of sodium amalgam. This is converted into propylene, $CH_2 = CH \cdot CH_3$. By heating it with zinc chloride, the propylene is passed into a concentrated solution of iodine chlorine; the propylene chloride thus produced is suspended in water, and chlorine gas passed into the liquid till the iodine first precipitated is redissolved; the pure propylene dichloride was then heated with dry iodine chlorine in sealed tubes to 140° for eight hours, the tubes being opened after a while to allow the escape of the hydrochloric acid gas, then again sealed up, and heated to 140° for eight hours. To remove the excess of iodine, the contents of the tubes are mixed with water, and chlorine passed into the liquid till the whole of the iodine is dissolved in the water as iodine chloride; the product is separated from the water and dried, and fractionally distilled. An impure trichlorhydrin, $CH_2Cl \cdot CHCl \cdot CH_2Cl$, is obtained, which, heated with water to 180°, yields glycerin. (Watts' Dict. Chem.) glyc-ër-ÿl, s. [Eng., &c., glycer(in); -yl = Gr. hylē = matter.]

Chem.: C_3H_5 . The triatomic radical of glycerin and the glycerides.

glyceryl-chloride, s. [CHLORHYDRINS.]

glyceryl-oxide, s.

Chem.: Glyceryl ether ($C_3H_5O_2$). Obtained by distilling glycerin with calcium chloride. It is a colorless oily liquid, boiling at 172°. It mixes with water, alcohol, and ether. Heated with water in a sealed tube at 100° it is converted into glycerin; it unites with bromine, forming dibromhydrin. It is not attacked by sodium amalgam; it is oxidized by chromic acid mixture, yielding formic acid and acetic acid.

glycid-a-mine, s. [English, &c., glycid(e), and amine.]

Chem.: C_3H_7NO , or $O < \begin{smallmatrix} CH_2 \\ | \\ CH \cdot CH_2 \cdot NH_2 \end{smallmatrix}$. A base produced by the action of alcohol, containing one per cent. of ammonia or dichlorhydrin. The hydrochlorate forms hygroscopic crystals, $C_3H_7NO \cdot HCl$.

glyc-ide, subst. [English, &c., glyc(erin), and (anhydrin) (q. v.).]

Chem.: $C_3H_5O_2$, or $O < \begin{smallmatrix} CH_2 \\ | \\ CH \end{smallmatrix}$ an alcohol obtained by dissolving glycidic acetate in ether, adding caustic soda, the solution being cooled with ice. Glycide is a liquid boiling at 163°. It is soluble in water, alcohol, and ether; heated with water it is converted into glycerin; by the action of dilute nitric acid it is converted into mono-nitroglycerin; it reduces ammoniacal solution of silver salts at ordinary temperatures.

glycid-ic, a. [Eng., &c., glycid(e); -ic.] Contained in or derived from glycide (q. v.).

Chem.: Obtained by heating epichlorhydrin (q. v.), with alcohol to 180° as ethyl glycidic ether,

$O < \begin{smallmatrix} CH_2 \\ | \\ CH \end{smallmatrix}$ boiling at 128°, and glycidic acetate,

$CH_2 \cdot O \cdot C_2H_5$

$O < \begin{smallmatrix} CH_2 \\ | \\ CH \end{smallmatrix}$ obtained by heating epichlorhydrin

$CH_2 \cdot O \cdot CO \cdot CH_3$ with dry potassium acetate to 115°, and then to 150°. It boils at 168°.

gly-clin, s. [GLYCOCINE.]

glyc-ÿ-nē, s. [Gr. glykys = sweet, because the leaves and roots of some species are sweet.]

Bot.: The typical genus of the sub-tribe Glycineae (q. v.), the species, all but one of which are decumbent if not even twining, have alternate leaves with axillary racemes or fascicles of yellow flowers. Locality, the warmer parts of the Old World. Glycine soja, the erect species alluded to, is cultivated in the East Indies for its beans. From these the Japanese make a sauce called soja or soy.

gly-clin-ē-æ, s. pl. [Lat. glycine, and fem. pl. adj. suff. -æe.]

Bot.: A sub-tribe of papilionaceous plants, tribe Phaseoleæ.

gly-cō, pref. [Gr. glykys = sweet.] Sweet.

gly-cō-chō-lāte, s. [Eng. glycocholic (ic); -ate.]

Chem.: A salt of glycocholic acid (q. v.).

gly-cō-chō-līc, a. [Eng., &c., glyco(gen), and cholic (q. v.).] (For def. see compound.)

glycocholic-acid, s.

Chem.: $C_{26}H_{43}NO_6$. An acid occurring as a sodium salt in the bile of most animals. It is obtained by covering fresh bile in a tall glass cylinder with a layer of ether, and adding 1 c. of strong HCl. To every 50 c. of bile; in a few days a crystalline mass is formed, which is filtered, washed with cold water, and crystallized out of boiling water; it forms fine needles, which melt at 100°, and are soluble in alcohol; when boiled with baryta water, it is decomposed into cholic acid and glycocine, $C_{26}H_{43}NO_6 + H_2O = C_{24}H_{41}O_5 + C_2H_5NO_2$. On adding to a solution of an alkaline glycocholate a few drops of a solution of sugar, then a drop of strong sulphuric acid, a red to a violet color is produced. Glycocholic acid forms salts which are called glycocholates; the glycocholates of the alkalis and earth metals are soluble in water and in alcohol. Glycocholate of sodium is precipitated from its alcoholic solution by ether; acetate of lead gives a precipitate which is soluble in alcohol.

gly-cō-cīne, s. [Gr. glykos = sweet; -ine.]

Chem.: Glycoccine, glycine, glycochol, amido-acetic acid, glycolamic acid, amido-glycolic acid. $C_2H_5NO_2$, or $CH_3(NH_2) \cdot CO \cdot OH$. Glycoccine can be obtained by boiling gelatin with baryta, neutralizing with sulphuric acid, evaporating and extracting with alcohol; by boiling one part of hippuric acid with four parts of fuming HCl, filtered when cold from the benzoic acid, evaporating to expel the excess of HCl, washing the residue with ammonia, then with absolute alcohol; by passing cyanogen gas into a boiling concentrated solution of hydriodic acid, $\begin{smallmatrix} CN \\ | \\ CN \end{smallmatrix} + 2H_2O + 5HI = NH_4I + 2I_2 + \begin{smallmatrix} CO \cdot OH \\ | \\ CN \end{smallmatrix}$;

also by the reduction by zinc and HCl of cyan-carbonyl ether in an alcoholic solution, $CN \cdot CO \cdot OC_2H_5 + 4H = H_2O + CH_2 \cdot NH_2 \cdot COOH + C_2H_5 \cdot OH$; by heating bromoacetic acid with ammonia; also by heating to 60° dry ammonium carbonate with monochloroacetic acid. It has a sweet taste, and melts at 170°; at higher temperatures it is decomposed. It gives a deep red color with ferric chlorides, which is destroyed by acids, but restored by ammonia; with phenol and hypochlorite of sodium it gives a beautiful blue color. Glycoccine forms crystalline compounds with acids, also salts with bases. Glycoccine heated with caustic baryta gives off methylamine; heated with sulphuric acid and manganese dioxide glycoccine is decomposed into hydrocyanic acid, water at CO_2 . Glycoccine heated with nitrous acid is converted into glycollic acid, with liberation of nitrogen.

gly-cō-cōl, s. [Gr. glykys = sweet, and kolla = glue.] [GLYCOCINE.]

gly-cō-cÿ-ām-i-dīne, s. [Eng., &c., glycocyanine (ine); -idine.]

Chem.: $C_3H_5N_3O$, or $HNC < \begin{smallmatrix} NH \cdot CO \\ | \\ NH \cdot CH_2 \end{smallmatrix}$. A base obtained by heating the hydrochlorate of glycoeyamine to 160°, and treating the hydrochlorate with $Pb(OH)_2$. It crystallizes in deliquescent plates, which are very soluble in water, having an alkaline reaction.

gly-cō-cÿ-a-mīne, s. [Eng., &c., glyco(cine), and cyamine.]

Chemistry: Guanidacetic acid, $C_3H_7N_3O_2$, or $HN = C(NH_2)(NH \cdot CH_2 \cdot CO \cdot OH)$. Boiled with water and dilute sulphuric acid, it is resolved into oxalic acid, guanidine, and carbonic acid.

gly-cō-drū-pōse, s. [Eng., &c., glyco(se), and drupose.]

Chemistry: $C_{21}H_{38}O_{10}$. The strong concretions in pears, produced by thickening and hardening of the cell walls, consists of this substance, together with a small quantity of mineral matter, which is removed by digesting them with dilute acetic acid. Glycodrupose is insoluble in water, alcohol, and ether; boiled with dilute nitric acid it yields cellulose and oxalic acid; boiled with dilute hydrochloric acid it yields drupose and glucose.

gly-cō-gēn, s. [Eng., &c., glyco(se); -gen.]

Chem.: $C_{12}H_{20}O_{10} + H_2O$. Glycogen occurs in the liver of mammals, and in mollusca. It is a white powder, which dissolves in water, forming an opalescent fluid, which is four times more dextrorotatory than a solution of dextrose of the same strength. It is insoluble in alcohol; it gives a red color with iodine solution, and does not reduce an alkaline solution of cupric oxide. When boiled with dilute sulphuric or dilute hydrochloric acid, it is converted into glucose. In the liver of an animal that has been long dead the glycogen has been converted into glucose.

gly-cō-gēn-āte, s. [Eng. glycogen (ic); -ate.]

Chem.: A salt of glycoenic acid (q. v.).

gly-cō-gēn-īc, a. [Eng., &c., glycogen; -ic.] Pertaining to or derived from glycogen (q. v.).

glycoenic-acid, s.

Chem.: $C_6H_{12}O_7$. An acid produced by the action of bromine and silver oxide, or glycogen; it is a syrup. Its salts are crystalline, soluble in water and insoluble in alcohol.

gly-cōl, s. [Eng., &c., glycer(in), and (alcohol) (ol).]

Chemistry:

1. Sing.: Ethene glycol, $C_2H_4O_2$ or $\begin{smallmatrix} CH_2 \cdot OH \\ | \\ CH_2 \cdot OH \end{smallmatrix}$.

A diatomic alcohol of the glycol series; obtained by distilling ethene diacetate with caustic potash. Glycol is a liquid having a sweet taste, boiling at 197°; soluble in alcohol and in water, only slightly soluble in ether. It is oxidized by nitric acid, forming glycollic acid, glyoxylic acid, and oxalic acid. Heated to 250° with solid caustic potash, it yields potassium oxalate, and gives off hydrogen, $2KOH + C_2H_4O_2 = K_2C_2O_4 + 2H_2$. Heated with zinc chloride, $ZnCl_2$, it yields aldehyde, an atom of water being eliminated; with PCl_5 it forms ethene dichloride, $C_2H_4Cl_2$; by the action of hydriodic acid, HI, it is reduced to ethyl iodide, C_2H_5I . Metallic sodium can replace either one or two atoms of hydrogen in the hydroxyl radicals, forming sodium ethenate, CH_2OH , and disodium diethenate, $\begin{smallmatrix} CH_2ONa \\ | \\ CH_2ONa \end{smallmatrix}$.

Glycol dissolves KHO and $Ca(OH)_2$.

2. Pl.: Diatomic alcohols of the fatty series, of which glycol is the first member. They may be regarded as derived from hydrocarbons of the paraffin series, C_nH_{2n+2} , by the substitution of two hydroxyl radicals, (OH) , for two atoms of hydrogen, attached to different carbon atoms; or from olefines, C_nH_{2n} , by the union with two hydroxyls. Glycols are obtained by combining an olefine with two atoms of bromine, $C_2H_4 + Br_2 = \begin{smallmatrix} CH_2Br \\ | \\ CH_2Br \end{smallmatrix}$, and converting the dibromide into diacetate, by means of an alcoholic solution of potassium acetate, and decomposing the diacetate by caustic potash; also obtained by combining an olefine with hypochlorous acid, $ClOH$, and acting on the chlorhydrin thus obtained by moist silver oxide, $\begin{smallmatrix} C_2HCl \\ | \\ C_2H \end{smallmatrix} + AgOH = AgCl + \begin{smallmatrix} CH_2OH \\ | \\ CH_2OH \end{smallmatrix}$.

The glycols are colorless, inodorous, fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāl, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pine, plt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wolf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fāl; try, Sÿrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

neutral liquids, having a sweet taste, and are in intermediate compounds between monatomic alcohols and glycerols. They are soluble in water and alcohol, but only slightly soluble in ether. By the action of hydrochloric acid they are converted into monatomic alcohols.

gly-côl-ic, a. [Eng., &c., glycol; -ic.] Derived from or pertaining to glycol.

Chemistry: The ethers of diatomic alcohols or glycols, the hydrogen in the hydroxyl radical being replaced by an acid radical, as $C_2H_4 \cdot \overset{OH}{\underset{OH}{|}}$ glycol, $C_2H_4 \cdot \overset{O \cdot C_2H_3O}{\underset{OH}{|}}$ glycol acetate, or monoacetate of ethylene, $C_2H_4 \cdot \overset{O \cdot C_2H_3O}{\underset{O \cdot C_2H_3O}{|}}$ glycol diacetate, or diacetate of ethylene, or by an alcohol radical, as, $C_2H_4 \cdot \overset{O \cdot C_2H_5}{\underset{OH}{|}}$ glycol monoethylate, and glycol diethylate, $C_2H_4 \cdot \overset{O \cdot C_2H_5}{\underset{O \cdot C_2H_5}{|}}$.

gly-cô-lig-nôse, s. [Pref. glyco-, and Eng., &c., lignose (q. v.).] Chem.: $C_{30}H_{48}O_{11}$. A yellowish white substance, obtained by exhausting the wood of the spruce fir, Abies excelsa, with dilute acetic acid, alcohol, and ether. It is decomposed by boiling with hydrochloric acid, yielding glucose and lignose, $C_{18}H_{26}H_{11}$. Glycoligose fused with caustic potash yields potassium salts of oxalic and succinic acids, and pyrocatechin, $C_6H_4(OH)_2$ (1-2).

gly-côl-lâ-mide, s. [English glycoll(ic), and amide.]

Chem.: $C_2H_5NO_2$, or $\overset{CO \cdot NH_2}{\underset{CO \cdot NH_2}{|}}$. The amide of glycolic acid. Obtained by heating ammonium tartrate till no more CO_2 is given off, and recrystallizing from water; also by the action of ammonia on ethyl glycolate. Glycollamide is soluble in water, and slightly soluble in alcohol. It melts at 120° . By the action of alkalis or dilute acids it is converted into ammonia and glycolic acid.

gly-côl-lâ-te, s. [Eng. glycoll(ic); -ate.] Chem.: A salt of glycollic acid (q. v.).

gly-côl-lîc, a. [Eng., &c., glycol, l connective, -ic.] Derived from or pertaining to glycol (q. v.).

glycollic-acid, s.

Chem.: Oxyacetic acid, oxacetic acid, $C_2H_3O_3$, or $CH_2OH \cdot COOH$. A diatomic monobasic fatty acid, containing an alcohol and an acid radical. It occurs in sour grapes and in the leaves of Ampelopsis heteracea. Glycollic acid can be obtained by the oxidation of glycol, by the action of nitric acid on alcohol, by heating a solution of oxalic acid to 100° for a week with granulated zinc, the oxalic acid being reduced by the nascent hydrogen, but it is best obtained by boiling in a flask connected with a condenser a mixture of one part of chloroacetic acid, $CH_2Cl \cdot COOH$, with twenty-four parts of water, some hours; the product is then evaporated on a water bath. Glycollic acid crystallizes out of water in needles, which melt at 80° . It is soluble in alcohol and in ether; by the action of concentrated nitric acid it is oxidized into oxalic acid, $COOH$. Glycollic acid forms crystalline salts called glycollates.

glycollic-anhydride, s.

Chem.: $C_4H_6O_5$, or $O \cdot \overset{CH_2 \cdot COOH}{\underset{CO \cdot CH_2 \cdot OH}{|}}$. A white powder, insoluble in alcohol, ether, and cold water; when boiled with water it is converted into glycollic acid. It melts at 130° , and is obtained by heating glycollic acid for a long time on a water-bath.

glycollic-ethers, s. pl.

Chem.: Ethers formed by replacing the H in the $(CO \cdot OH)$ group of glycollic acid by alcohol radicals, as methyl glycollate, $CH_3OH \cdot CO \cdot OH$. gly-côl-lide, s. [Eng. glycoll(ic); -ide.] Chem.: An anhydride of glycollic acid, $C_2H_2O_3$, or $CH_2 > O$, obtained by heating glycollic acid between 250° to 280° , also by heating dry potassium chloracetate to 110° – 120° , or heating tartaric acid to 180° . It is a powder insoluble in cold water; it melts at 220° . When warmed with ammonia it is converted into glycollamide (q. v.).

gly-cô-lur-ic, a. [Eng. glycol, and uric.] Pertaining to glycol and urea; as, glycoluric acid.

gly-cô-lÿl, s. [Eng., &c., glycol (q. v.); -yl=Gr. hylê=matter.]

Chem.: (For def. see etym. and compound.)

glycolyl-guanidin, s. [GLYCOCYAMIDINE.]

bôil, bôy; pôut, jôwi; cat, cell, chorus, chin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph=f.

glycolyl-urea, s. [HYDANTOIN.] gly-cô-ni-an, gly-côn-ic, a. [Gr. glykônaios, from its inventor Glykon.]

Pros.: A name given to a certain kind of verse in Greek and Latin poetry. It consists of three feet, a spondee, a choriamb, and a pyrrhic: --|---|---|---| or it may be scanned as a spondee and two dactyls: --|---|---|---|.

gly-côn-ic, a. [GLYCONIAN.] gly-côs-a-mine, s. [Eng., &c., glycos(e), and amine.]

Chem.: $C_6H_{13}NO_5$. The hydrochlorate of this base is obtained by boiling chitin for half an hour with concentrated hydrochloric acid. Glycosamine crystallizes from alcohol in needles; it reduces cupric solution.

gly-côse, s. [GLUCOSE.] gly-cô-side, s. [GLUCOSIDE.] gly-cô-sine, s. [Eng., &c., glyco(l), s connective, and -ine.]

Chem.: $C_6H_{12}O_6$. An organic base obtained by the action of ammonia on glyoxal. It is a colorless crystalline powder, almost insoluble in water; it sublimates in needles without melting, dissolves in acids, and forms crystalline salts.

gly-côs-mis, s. [Prefix glyco-, and Gr. osmê=smell.] Bot.: A genus of Aurantaceae. Glycosmis citrifolia bears fruits of a delicious flavor.

gly-gyr-rhê-tin, s. [Eng. glycyrrh(iza); -etin.] Chem.: A brown brittle resin, obtained by boiling glycyrrhizin with dilute acids; insoluble in water, soluble in alcohol and alkalis. It dissolves in concentrated sulphuric acid, forming a red solution, which changes to purple.

gly-gÿr-rhiz-a, s. [Greek glykys=sweet, and rhiza=a root.] 1. Bot.: A genus of papilionaceous plants, subtribe Galegeae. It has a tubular, five-cleft and two-lipped calyx, and an ovate compressed one to four-seeded pod. Glycyrrhiza glabra is said to furnish the Spanish licorice. [LICORICE.] The roots of G. echinata and G. glandulifera are alleged to have the same qualities.

2. Pharm.: Licorice-root. The recent and dried root or underground stem of Glycyrrhiza glabra. It occurs in cylindrical-branched pieces, brown on the surface and yellow within, tough and pliable, sweet and mucilaginous to the taste. It contains a substance called Glycyrrhizin (q. v.), also asparagine, gum mucilage, &c. It is used as a powder in pills, and also to form Extractum glycyrrhizæ, extract of licorice, which is obtained by maceration and percolation of the root, and evaporation to a proper consistence. It is a sweet demulcent, useful to relieve coughing and to soothe the mucous membrane. It is often given with powdered senna.

gly-gÿr-rhiz-in, s. [Eng. glycyrrhiz(a), -in.] Chem.: $C_{41}H_{63}NO_{13}$. A crystalline substance obtained by boiling the root of glycyrrhiza glabra in alcohol, and evaporating the alcoholic solution to dryness. It is decomposed by boiling with dilute acids into glucose and glycyrrhetin. When fused with caustic potash it is converted into para-oxybenzoic acid, $C_6H_4 \cdot OH \cdot COOH$ (1-4).

glÿn, glÿnne, s. [Irish.] A glen. (It occurs frequently in compound names of places in Ireland, as Glen does in Scotland.)

"Though he could not beat out the Irish, yet he did shut them up within those narrow corners and glÿns under the mountain's foot."—Spenser: State of Ireland.

gly-ôx-al, s. [Eng., &c., glycol; or alic], and al(dehyde).]

Chem.: The diatomic aldehyde of glycol and of oxalic acid, $C_2H_2O_2$ or $\overset{CO \cdot H}{\underset{CO \cdot H}{|}}$. Obtained by the gradual oxidation of ethyl-alcohol by nitric acid, the liquids being separated by a layer of water. Glyoxal is a transparent, deliquescent, amorphous substance; it is oxidized by dilute nitric acid into glyoxylic acid, and by concentrated nitric acid into oxalic acid. It reduces an ammoniacal solution of a silver salt, forming a metallic mirror; by the action of alkalis it is converted into glycollic acid. A very dilute solution of glyoxal, when warmed with a little potassium cyanide, KCN, turns a dark red color.

gly-ôx-a-lâte, s. [Eng. glyoxal(ic); -ate.] Chem.: A salt of glyoxylic acid (q. v.).

gly-ôx-âl-ic, a. [Eng., &c., glycol, and oxalic.] (For def. see compound.)

glyoxylic-acid, s.

Chemistry: Also called glyoxylic-acid, $C_2H_2O_3$ or $CO \cdot H \cdot CO \cdot OH$, a dyad compound, containing an aldehyde and an acid radical. Obtained along with glyoxal by oxidation of ethyl-alcohol with nitric acid; also by heating at 140° one part of dichloroacetic acid, $CHCl_2 \cdot COOH$, with ten parts of water for twenty four hours. Glyoxylic acid is a thick syrup, which can be crystallized over H_2SO_4 . It is very soluble in water, and can be distilled in a current of steam. It is a monobasic acid, forming crystalline salts called glyoxalates. By oxidizing agents it is converted into oxalic acid; by nascent hydrogen it is reduced to glycollic acid. It has also the properties of an aldehyde, reducing ammoniacal solutions of silver salts, forming a metallic mirror; also unites with alkaline bisulphites. Glyoxylic acid, when boiled with excess of lime-water, yields calcium glycollate and calcium oxalate.

gly-ôx-a-lîne, s. [Eng., &c., glyoxal; -ine.]

Chem.: $C_3H_4N_2$, or $NC \cdot \overset{H}{\underset{H}{|}} \cdot CH \cdot NH$. Obtained by treating glyoxal, kept cool on ice, with a slight excess of ammonia, glycosine separates as a powder, the filtered liquid is boiled with milk of lime, evaporated to a syrup, and extracted with alcohol, and distilling the alcoholic solution. Glyoxaline crystallizes in white prisms, which melt at 89° , and boil at 255° . It is soluble in water, alcohol, and in ether. It unites with acids to form crystalline compounds.

gly-ôx-ÿl-ic, a. [GLYOXALIC.] glyph, s. [Gr. glyphê, from glyphô=to carve.]

Arch. & Sculpt.: A perpendicular fluting or channeling, used as an ornament.

gly-phæ-a, s. [Greek glyphê=carving, carved work.]

1. Bot.: A genus of Tiliaceae.

2. Paleont.: A genus of Macrurous Crustaceans. Prof. Morris enumerates one species from the Lias and two from the Oolite.

glyph-ic, a. [Gr. glyphikos, from glyphô=to carve.] Pertaining to carving or sculpture; of or pertaining to a glyph or glyphs.

gly-phî-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. glyph(is), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Bot.: A family of Lichens, tribe Idiothalamæ.

glyph-ip-têr-ÿg-i-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. glyphipteryx (genit. glyphipterygis), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Entom.: A family of Moths, group Tineina. The imago has the head generally smooth; the labial palpi variable; the maxillary palpi very short, the anterior wings oblong or elongate; the posterior ones ovate or lanceolate; the flight diurnal. The larva has sixteen legs or is apodal. It generally mines in leaves.

glyph-ip-têr-ÿx, s. [Gr. glyphis=an arrow-head, and ptêrÿx=wing.]

Entom.: The typical genus of the family Glyphipterygidae (q. v.). The species fly in the bright sunshine.

gly-phîs, s. [Gr. glyphis=a notch of an arrow, an arrow.]

Bot.: The typical genus of the family Glyphidæ (q. v.).

glyph-ô-graph, s. [Greek glyphê=a carving; graphô=to write, to draw.]

Engin.: A plate prepared by glyphotography; an impression taken from such a plate.

glyph-ô-graph, v. t. [GLYPHOGRAPH, s.] To engrave by the system of glyphotography.

glyph-ôg-ra-phêr, s. [Eng. glyphotograph; -er.] One who is skilled in or practices glyphotography.

glyph-ô-graph-ic, a. [Eng. glyphotograph; -ic.] Of or pertaining to glyphotography.

glyph-ôg-ra-phÿ, s. [Gr. glyphê=a carving, and graphô=to write, to draw.] A name given by Mr. Palmer to his relief line engraving. A thin ground of wax is spread upon the plate; this is etched or cut away so as to give the design in intaglio. The ground is now covered with a film of graphite, after which metal is precipitated upon the metal in an electro-bath, giving a metallic plate with the design in relief. The copper shell is backed with lead and used as an ordinary printing surface.

glyp-tic, a. [Gr. glyptikos=carving; glyphô=to engrave; Fr. glyptique.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Pertaining or relating to engraving on precious stones.

2. Min.: Figured.

glyp-tics, s. [GLYPTIC, a.] The art of engraving on precious stones.

glyp-tô, pref. [Gr. glyptos=fit for carving, carved.] Carved or looking as if it were so.

glyp-tô-crî-nî-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. glyptocrin(us), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Paleont.: A family of Crinoidea. It has no parabasal, but five basals with six inter-radials in each inter-radial space. The plates are usually ornamented with radiating ridges, as if they had been carved for ornament, whence the name.

Paleont.: A family of Crinoidea. It has no parabasal, but five basals with six inter-radials in each inter-radial space. The plates are usually ornamented with radiating ridges, as if they had been carved for ornament, whence the name.

glýp-tò-crì-nûs, s. [Pref. glypto-, and Gr. krinon = a lily.] [GLYPTOCRINIDÆ.]

Palæont.: The typical genus of the family Glyptocrinidæ (q. v.). Glyptocrinus basalis is figured by Murchison from the Lower Silurian rocks.

glýp-tò-díp-tér-i-ni, s. pl. [Pref. glypto-; Gr. dipteros=with two wings, here=with two fins, and Lat. masc. pl. adj. suff. -ini.]

Palæont.: In the classification of Professor Huxley, a family of fossil ganoid fishes, sub-order Crossopterygida. There are two dorsal fins, the scales are sculptured, the pectoral fins acutely lobate, dendition dendodont. There are two sub-families, the one with rhomboidal, and the other with cycloidal scales. Under the latter family fall the genus Holoptychius, &c.

glýp-tò-dôn, s. [Pref. glypto-, and Gr. odous (genit. odontos)=a tooth.]

Palæont.: A huge fossil mammal, family Dasy-podidæ (Armadillos). It was encased in armor, there being bony plates on the head, and nearly hexagonal bony scutes on the body. It belongs to the Post-pliocene of South America. Including the tail, Glyptodon clavipes was more than nine feet long.

Glyptodon.

glýp-tò-dont, s. [Pref. glypto-, and Gr. odous (genit. odontos)=a tooth.]

Palæont.: Pertaining to the family Glyptodontidæ. One of about twenty known species of extinct South American edentates.

glýp-tò-graph, s. [Prefix glypto-, and Greek graphô=to write, to draw.] An engraving on precious stones or gems.

glýp-tòg-ra-phêr, s. [Eng. glyptograph; -er.] One who is skilled in or practices glyptography; an engraver on precious stones.

glýp-tò-graph-ic, a. [Eng. glyptograph; -ic.] Of or pertaining to glyptography, or the art of engraving on gems or precious stones.

glýp-tòg-ra-phý, s. [Pref. glypto-, and Gr. graphê=a writing, a drawing.]

1. The art of engraving on gems or precious stones.
2. A description of the art of engraving on gems or precious stones.

glýp-tò-læ-mûs, s. [Pref. glypto-, and Gr. laimos=the throat.]

Palæont.: A genus of Fossil Ganoids, family Glyptodontiprinidæ, and the section or sub-family of it with rhomboidal scales. It has been found only in the Devonian rocks.

glýp-tò-saur-i-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. glyptosaurus (q. v.), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Palæont.: A family of Lacertilia (Lizards). The skin had ornamented osseous scales. It is found in the Tertiary deposits.

glýp-tò-saur-ûs, s. [Pref. glypto-, and Gr. sauros, saura=a lizard.]

Palæont.: The typical genus of the family Glyptosauridæ (q. v.).

glýp-tò-thê-ca, s. [Pref. glypto-, and Latin theca; Gr. thêkê=a box, a chest.] [THECA.]

Arch., &c.: A box, room, or building for the preservation of sculpture.

gmê-lî-nâ (g silent), s. [Named after John George Gmelin, a celebrated German naturalist, who traveled to Siberia, and published a flora of that region.]

Bot.: A genus of Verbenaceæ, tribe Viticæ. The leaves of Gmelina parviflora render water mucilaginous. It may then be employed as a ptilon for the cure of arbor urinae. (Lindley.)

gmê-lî-nî-te (g silent), s. [Named after Prof. Charles Gmelin, of Tübingen, Germany.]

Min.: A colorless, yellowish-white, greenish-white, or reddish-white, fresh, transparent to translucent, brittle mineral, crystallizing in rhombohedrons. Hardness, 4.5; specific gravity, 2.04-2.17. Composition: Silica, 46.37-53.71; alumina, 17.63-21.48; lime, 3.67-11.48; soda, 3.10-7.29; potassa, 0.39-1.87; water, 8.58-29.41. Sarcollite, Ledererite, and Hydrolite are varieties. Found at Andreasberg, in the Harz; at Montecchio, Maggiore, and Castel, in the Vicentine; in Cyprus; near Cape Blomidon, in Nova Scotia, &c. (Dana.)

Gnâp (g silent), v. t. [Ety. doubtful.] To gnaw, to eat.

gnâ-phâl-i-ô (g silent), s. pl. [Lat. gnaphalium (q. v.), and fem. pl. adj. suff. -i-ô.]

Bot.: A tribe of composite plants, sub-order or series Tubulifloræ. The flowers are all tubular, the outer ones very slender.

gnâ-phâ-lî-ûm (g silent), s. [Lat. gnaphalium, gnaphalion; Gr. gnaphalion=either the cudweed or the lavender cotton-weed.]

Bot.: Cudweed. The typical genus of the tribe Gnaphalieæ (q. v.). The heads are bi-sexual, the receptacle flat and naked. About 100 species are known.

gnar (g silent), gnarre, knarre, knur, knurr, s. [Cf. O. Dut. knor; Dut. knor=a knot; Dan. knor=a knot, a gnarl; knorlet=knotty, gnarled; Sw. knorla=a curl, a ringlet; Icel. gnerr=a knot, a knob; Ger. knorren=an excrescence, a lump; 1. "A gnædy gloton with to grette chekes."

P. Plowman, xvi. 85.

gneiss (g silent), s. [Ger. gneiss, gneus, a German mining term given by geologists, who have given it world-wide currency.]

Geology and Petrology:

1. Spec.: A metamorphic rock, consisting of orthoclase, quartz, and mica. It is akin to mica schist, which, however, is distinguished by having less orthoclase and more mica. It has exactly the same materials as granite, but is stratified or foliated. Sometimes hand specimens are found, in which lamination is so little traceable, that they might pass for granite. There are cases also in which gneiss, in position, does not consist of thin laminae, but is divided into thick beds, in which the mica has only a slight degree of parallelism to the planes of stratification. Sometimes it is penetrated from below by granitic veins. (Lyell, &c.) [METAMORPHIC.]

2. Gen.: A formation in which gneiss [No. 1] prevails, but not exclusively, there being present also hornblende-schist and other metamorphic rocks. These latter are considered as subordinate to the gneiss.

Fundamental gneiss, Laurentian gneiss:

Geol.: The name given by Sir Roderick Murchison to the oldest stratified rock in Scotland. It is found in the northwest of Ross-shire, and in Sutherland-shire, besides forming the whole of the adjoining island of Lewis in the Hebrides. It has a strike from northwest to southeast, nearly at right angles to the metamorphic strata of the Grampians. The Lower Cambrian and various metamorphic rocks rest on it unconformably. (Lyell, &c.)

gneis-sic (g silent), a. [Ger. &c., gneiss; Eng. &c., suff. -ic.]

Geol.: Consisting of gneiss.

"The old gneissic rocks of Nova Scotia."—Hind, in Quar. Jour. Geol. Soc., xxvi. 471.

gneis-soid (g silent), a. [Ger. &c., gneiss, and Gr. eidōs, form, appearance.]

Geol.: Resembling gneiss.

"The unconformable contact of the Lower Silurian gold-bearing strata with the underlying gneissoid and schistose series."—Hind, in Quar. Jour. Geol. Soc., xxvi. 474.

gneis-sōse (g silent), a. [Ger. &c., gneiss; Eng. &c., suff. -ose (q. v.).]

Geol.: Properly, abounding in gneiss; but used also simply for gneissic (q. v.).

"The Eastern gneissose rocks of Sutherland and Ross."—Murchison in Quar. Jour. Geol. Soc., xvi., p. 237.

gnē-tā-çō-æ (g silent), s. pl. [Mod. Latin gnēt(um) (q. v.), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -aceæ.]

Bot.: Joint-firs; an order of Gymnogens, with repeatedly-branched jointed stems and simple net-veined leaves, opposite and entire, sometimes very minute and scale-shaped; flowers in catkins, or heads; the males with a one-leaved calyx, transversely slit at the end; a monadelphous filament, with one-celled anthers opening by pores; females, altogether naked or sheltered by a false calyx, consisting of two scales, each surrounding two flowers; ovary, none; ovule with a style-like process. Known genera, two—viz., Gnetum and Ephedra (q. v.); species, fifteen, scattered over the world.

gnē-tūm (g silent), s. [Corrupted from Gnemon, the name given to the plant in the island of Ter-nate.]

Bot.: The typical genus of the order Gnetaceæ (q. v.). The species are found in the hottest parts of India and Guiana. In Amboyne the seeds of Gnetum gnemon are eaten boiled, roasted, or fried, and the green leaves, though tasteless, are used as spinach.

gnide, gnid-en, gnyde, v. t. & i. [A.S. gnidan; O. H. Ger. gnitan; M. H. Ger. gniten; Sw. gnida; Dan. gnide.]

A. Trans.: To break or grind to pieces; to bruise.

B. Intrans.: To be brought to nothing; to be destroyed utterly.

"Gold and seolver, but schal gnyde to nouht."—O. Eng. Miscell., p. 114.

gnī-di-æ, s. [Lat. Gnidius=pertaining to Gnidus or Cnidus, a town of Caria.]

Bot.: A genus of Thymelacææ (Daphnads). The known species, about fifty in number, are pretty heath-like plants, several of which have been introduced from the warmer parts of Eastern Africa. Gnidium daphnoides is manufactured into ropes in Madagascar; most species of the genus can, moreover, be used in cutaneous diseases.

gnof, gnoff, s. [Etym. doubtful; perhaps connected with gnaw (q. v.).] A miser; a stingy, mean fellow.

"Whilom ther was dwelling in Oxenforde
A riche gnof, that gestes belde to borde,
And of his craft he was a carpenter."

Chaucer: C. T., 3, 184.

gnōme (1) (g silent), s. [Fr.; prob. from Greek gnōmē=intelligence, from the belief that the gnomes could furnish information as to secret treasures in the earth.]

1. An imaginary being, a kind of sprite. Gnomes were supposed by the Rosicrucians to inhabit the inner parts of the earth, and to be the guardians of mines, quarries, &c.

"The gnomes or demons of earth, delight in mischief."

—Pope: Ep. Dedic. to Mrs. A. Fermor.

2. A dwarf; a goblin; a person of small or misshapen figure or features.

gnōme (2), gnō-mē (g silent), s. [Gr. gnōmē=intelligence, a maxim, from gnōnai=to know.] A maxim, an aphorism, a saw, a reflection.

"Gnome [is] a saying pertaining to the manners and common practices of men, which declareth by an apte brevity, what in this our life ought to be done or not done."—Peascham: Garden of Eloquence. (1571.)

gnōmed, a. [Eng. gnome (1); -ed.] Haunted by gnomes.

"Empty the haunted air and the gnomed mine."

Keats: Lamia, II.

gnō-mic (1), gnō-mic-æ (1) (g silent), a. [Gr. gnōmikos=dealing in maxims, sententious; Gr. gnōmē.] [GNOME (2).] Dealing in maxims; sententious; didactic; a term applied to Greek didactic poets, such as Solon, Phocylides, Theognis, &c., and to their writings.

"A city long famous as the seat of elegiac and gnomic poetry."—G. H. Leves: History of Philosophy, i. 39.

gnō-mic (2), gnō-mic-æ (2) (g silent), a. [Catachrestic for gnomonical (q. v.).] Pertaining to a dial or the art of dialing.

gnomic-poets, s. pl. Poets whose writings consist of short, sententious precepts and reflections. Theognis and Solon, two Greek poets of the sixth century B. C. were designated such.

gnō-mic-æ (1) (g silent), adv. [Eng. gnomical; -ly.] In a gnomical, didactic, or sententious manner.

gnō-mō-lōg-ic, gnō-mō-lōg-ic-æ (initial g silent), a. [Gr. gnōmologikos, from gnōmologē=to speak in maxims.] [GNOMOLOGY.] Of or pertaining to gnomology.

gnō-mōl-ō-gy (initial g silent), s. [Gr. gnōmē=a maxim, and logos=a word, a discourse; Gr. legō=to collect, to speak; Fr. gnomologie.] A treatise on, or collection of, maxims or sententious reflections or sayings; the knowledge of or literature relating to such maxims or sayings.

"Which art of powerful reclaiming, wisest men have also taught in their ethical precepts and gnomologies."—Milton: Tetrachordon.

gnō-mōm-ē-try (g silent), s. [Gr. gnōmē=a maxim, and metron=a measure.] A dividing or arraying according to subject.

"We can touch but lightly on the intricate question of stichometry as opposed to gnomometry."—Athenæum, July 8, 1882, p. 43.

gnō-mōn (g silent), s. [Lat., from Gr. gnōmōn=one who knows, an interpreter; from Gr. gnōnai=to know.]

1. Astron.: A rod, style, or pillar erected perpendicularly to the horizon, from whose shadow the altitudes, declinations, &c., of the sun and stars may be determined. Such styles were in use in ancient Egypt, in China, and similar contrivances were found at Quito by the invading Spaniards.

"Comparing the height of a gnomon or pillar with the length of the solstitial shadow."—Elton: Origins of English History, p. 14.

2. Dial.: The style or pin, which, by its shadow on the dial-plate, shows the hour of the day.

"The shadow of the style in the dial which they call the gnomon, in Egypt, at noon-tide, in the equinoctial day, is little more in length than half the gnomon."—P. Holland: Flitny, bk. ii., ch. lxiii.

Dial-plate, with Gnomon.

3. Geom.: The figure made up of the two complements of a parallelogram, together with either of the parallelograms about the diameter. Thus in the parallelogram A B C D, the two complements B F and F D, together with the parallelogram F K C H, form the gnomon D K G or E H B. In the second figure one of the parallelograms about the diameter has been removed, so as to form a gnomon.

4. The index of the hour-circle of a globe.

gnō-mōn-ic, gnō-mōn-ic-æ (g silent), a. [Lat. gnomonicus, from Gr. gnōmōnikos=pertaining to a gnomon; hē gnōmonikē (technē)=the (art) of dialing; Fr. gnomonique.]

1. Dial.: Of or pertaining to the art of dialing.

"One of those curious gnomonic instruments, that show at once the place of the sun in the zodiac, his declination from the equator, the day of the month, the length of the day, &c."—Boyle: Works, v. 398.

2. Bot.: The term applied by Link to the embryo when bent at right angles.

gnomonic-projection, s. The projection of the lines of a sphere upon a plane tangent to the surface of the sphere, the point of sight or the eye being taken at the center of the sphere. In this projection all great circles of the sphere are projected into straight lines; all small circles, whose planes are parallel to the plane of projection, into concentric circles, having their common center at the point of contact; and all other small circles into ellipses. Gnomonic projection is also called horologigraphic projection, on account of its use in dialing.

gnō-mōn-ic-æ (1) (g silent), adv. [Eng. gnomonical; -ly.] In a gnomonical manner; according to the principles of gnomonic projection.

bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, çem; thin, this; sin, aç; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph=f. -cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shün; -tion, -sion = zhün. -tious, -cious, -sious = shüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bəl, dəl.

gnō-mōn'-ics, gnō-mōn'-icks (g silent), s. pl. [GNOMIC.] The art or science of dialing, or of constructing dials to show the hour of the day.

"The elevations of the pole, and the azimuths, sundials of all sorts, enough to make up an art called gnomonics."—Boyle: Works, vi. 776.

gnō-mōn'-ist (g silent), s. [Eng. gnomon; -ist.] One versed in gnomonics.

"The sun enables the gnomonist to make accurate dials, to know exactly how the time passes."—Boyle: Works, vi. 418.

gnō-mōn'-ō-ō-gy (initial g silent), s. [Gr. gnōmōn=a gnomon, and logos=a treatise; a discourse.] A treatise on gnomonics or dialing.

gnōph'-ri-a (g silent), s. [Gr. gnopheros, gnopheros=dark, dusky; gnophos, gnophos=darkness.] Entom.: A genus of moths, family Lithosidæ. Gnophria rubricollis is the Black Footman. The front part of the thorax is red, the rest black, as is the abdomen, except the four or five last segments, which are yellow; all the wings of a dull, smoky black. The larva feeds on various lichens.

gnōs'-cō-pine, s. An alkaloid found in small quantities in opium.

gnō'-sis (g silent), s. [Gr. gnōsis=(1) an inquiry, a judgment, especially of a judicial kind, (2) knowledge, spec. of the deeper kind; gignōsko, fut. gnōsomai=to know: from the root gnō=to know.] What is considered as science—i. e., knowledge, through it may be chiefly a series of hypotheses; gnosticism, which professes to restore to mankind the lost knowledge of God.

"But the supposition that the Alexandrian gnosis first formed that of Palestine is, in our opinion, quite erroneous."—Tholuck: Epistle to the Hebrews (1842), i. 130.

1. After the manner of the gnostics.

2. Properly, suitably, becomingly.

gnōs'-tī-cīsm (g silent), s. [Eng., &c., gnostic; -ism.]

Hist. & Phil., &c.: A system of philosophy professedly Christian, devised to solve the great questions, such as the origin of evil, which have perplexed the ablest minds in every age. Gnosticism accepted beliefs in an eternal God of infinite power, wisdom, and goodness. The granting of this postulate at once brought the gnostic face to face with the question, why then did this Great Being allow evil to arise in the universe, when it was in his power to have prevented it? If he did not prevent it, was he not to a certain extent responsible for its existence? The same difficulty had centuries before created the dualist system of Zoroastrianism, which denying the omnipotence of the one Supreme Being, assumed the existence of two, a good and a bad one, about equal in power, and in continual conflict. This view, derived from Persia, was partially adopted by some gnostics, while others of the sect, or aggregation of sects, drew on the later Platonism of Alexandria for their inspiration. There were then two classes of them: the Syrian, and the Alexandrian or Egyptian gnostics. In certain tenets both agreed. Matter was eternal, and from the first essentially evil; there was then no bygone time when "the origin of evil" took place. Nor was the world created by the Supreme Being; it was framed by an exalted spirit, called, in consequence, the Demiurge (q. v.), whom many identified with the God of the Jews. He had shining qualities, but was selfish and arrogant. He wished men to worship, not the Supreme Being, but himself. The former was the purest Light, and pervaded that boundless space which the Greeks called plērōma. He did not remain forever alone, but brought into existence two holy and happy spirits of different sexes, called Eons, from whose marriage came others of the same order, till there was a whole family of them in the plērōma. The chief of these Eons was Jesus Christ, who was sent to the world to win it back from the Demiurge to its proper allegiance. Many gnostics held what were called Docetic views. [DOCETÆ.] The germs of gnosticism existed in the first century; it did not, however, reach maturity till the reign of Adrian in the second. Of the Syrian gnostics there were Saturninus of Antioch, Cerdo, Marcian, Lucian, Severus, Blastus, Bardesanes, Tatian, &c.; of the Egyptian Basilides of Alexandria, Valentinus, &c. The system had a good deal declined by the third century, but was not extinct till about the sixth. It has been disputed whether there are allusions to either nascent or fully developed gnosticism in the New Testament. Some writers profess to find them in such passages as Col. ii. 8; 1 Tim. i. 4, vi. 20; 2 Tim. ii. 16, 17; Titus iii. 9; and there appears to be one to Doceticism in 1 John i. 1-3.

"To this strange mixture was added no inconsiderable portion of Christianity, into which gnosticism had been imported by that father of heresy Simon Magus."—Levin: St. Paul, ii. 250.

gnu (g silent), s. [Hottentot gnu, gnou=the name of the animal; Fr. gnou.]

Zoology: Catoblepas gnu, a species of antelope. The adult male is about 5 ft. 6 in. long, and 3 ft. 10 in. high at the shoulder; horns dark, broad, upon the summit of the head, tapering out sideways over the eyes, and turning up into a pointed hook. Legs long. The face is covered with black bristly hair, with white ones around the eye and on the legs; on the neck is a vertical mane, black in the center and white at the sides; a bushy beard on the under jaw; general color of the fur deep brown, with long white hair on the tail. Females smaller; calves pure white. But for the horns and the cloven hoofs, the gnu would resemble a horse in its external form; its gallop also is that of a horse. The gnu lives in small herds in the karroos of Southern Africa. When alarmed it flings up its heels and capers like a restive horse; then the herd go off in single file, following a leader, with amazing speed. A gnu brought to bay or wounded turns on its assailant. It is believed that the kokoon is not distinct from the gnu.

Gnu.

"Where the gnu, the gazelle, and the hartebeest graze." Thomas Pringle: Afar in the Desert.

¶ In Christian art the goat is an emblem of impurity. It sometimes occurs in the carving under seat or choir-stalls, and is put there as a mark of dishonor.

Zoölogy:

I. Singular:

(1) Capra hircus, the domestic goat, which exists, in a wild or semi-wild state, in all the European mountain ranges. It is generally supposed that it may be a descendant of the Paseng of Persia (Capra agagrus). Professor Boyd Dawkins considers that, with various other domestic animals, came in with the neolithic farmer and herdsman, there being no trace of it while the palæolithic hunter constituted the highest type of manhood in Europe. The males fight furiously with each other in the rutting time. They have an offensive smell.

The fore wings are pale brown, clouded with whitish, and marked with numerous short, irregular transverse wavy black lines; hind wings pale-smoky, with similar transverse dark lines, but less distinct; expansion of wings three to above three and a half inches; larva reddish black on the back, sides of a dull yellowish or flesh color; head black; smell offensive. It feeds on the wood of willows, poplars, and oaks, sometimes perforating the wood in all directions. It is said to be three years in reaching maturity. (Stainton.)

Prof. Max Müller says that "though it is impossible to give a satisfactory etymology of either God or good, it is clear that two words which thus run parallel in all the dialects without ever meeting cannot be traced back to one central point. God was most likely an old heathen name of the deity, and for such a name the supposed etymological meaning of good would be far too modern, too abstract, too Christian." (2) (Of the form god): Any superior or imaginary being, constituting an object of worship.

"For though there be that are called gods, whether in heaven or in earth (as there be gods many, and lords many)."—1 Cor. viii. 5.

2. Figuratively:

(1) An emperor, king, or any other person, wielding great and despotic power.

"Art thou the god, the thunder of whose hand Rolled over all our desolated land?"

Cooper: Charity, 75.

(2) Any person or thing greatly idolized.

"How shall I speak thee, or thy power address, Thou god of our idolatry, the Press."

Cooper: Progress of Error, 460.

II. Religions:

1. Ethnic: Whether any savage tribes exist with no belief in any being higher than man, is doubtful. Burton and Sir John Lubbock are of opinion, as was Mr. Darwin, that there have been and still are such tribes; Dr. Tylor, after explaining away some alleged cases, expresses doubt of those remaining. Lubbock thus arranges the first great stages in religious thought: Atheism, understanding by this term, not a denial of the existence of a Deity, but an absence of any definite ideas on the subject. Fetichism, the stage in which man supposes he can force the Deity to comply with his desires. Nature-worship or Totemism, in which natural objects, trees, lakes, stones, animals, &c., are worshipped. Shamanism, in which the superior deities are far more powerful than man, and of a different nature. Their place of abode also is far away, and accessible only to Shamans. Idolatry or Anthropomorphism, in which the gods take still more completely the nature of men, being, however, more powerful. They are still amenable to persuasion; they are a part of nature, and not creatures. They are represented by images or idols. In the next stage, the Deity is regarded as the author, not merely a part of nature. He becomes for the first time a really supernatural being. The last stage is that in which morality is associated with religion. (Lubbock: Origin of Civilization (1870), p. 119.)

2. Jewish: Two leading names for the Supreme Being continually occur in the Hebrew Bible; the one generic, the other specific. The generic term is El, or Eloah, both singular, and Elohim plural. The specific one is Yehovah, in general written Yehovah (q. v.). It is of the first that God is the appropriate rendering. El, Eloah, and Elohim signify Deity in general. Elohim is much more common than the singular forms. An anomalous grammatical idiom is generally introduced where it occurs. While it has the plural form, im being the plural of Hebrew masculine nouns, the verb, of which it is nominative, is uniformly singular. Older writers found in this a reference to the Trinity in Unity; grammarians term it the plural of excellence, and some have supposed that the plural noun carries us back to the infancy of the Hebrew language when polytheism prevailed, and that the singular verb established itself when monotheism displaced the worship of many gods. Among the epithets or titles used of God in the Old Testament are Most High (Gen. xiv. 18, &c.), Mighty (Neh. ix. 32), Holy (Josh. xxiv. 19), Merciful (Deut. iv. 31), God of Heaven (Ezra v. 12), God of Israel, &c. (Exod. xxiv. 10). Anthropomorphic language occurs chiefly, though not exclusively, in the poetic parts of the Old Testament (2 Chron. xvi. 9, Psalm xxxiv. 15, Deut. viii. 3, Psalm xxix. 4, Isa. xl. 12, liii. 1, ix. 13, Exod. xxxii. 23), but monotheism is enjoined in the first commandment, and idolatry forbidden in the second, while in Isaiah and elsewhere there are most scathing denunciations of the manufacture and worship of images (Isa. xl. 12-26, xlii. 17, xlv. 9-20, &c.). In the New Testament, St. John gives the ever-memorable definition of the Divine nature, "God is love" (1 John iv. 16). The Latin Church, the Greek Church, and the several Protestant denominations all essentially agree in their tenets regarding God. See the Apostles', Nicene, and Athanasian Creeds, the first of the Thirty-nine Articles, the Catechism of the Council of Trent, the Confession of Faith (ch. ii.), and the Shorter Catechism, question 4. [THEOLOGY, TRINITY.]

¶ Of God:

Script.: A term sometimes used as a superlative to designate whatever is specially great or admirable. Thus the trees of God are cedars (Ps. civ. 16), and the "river of God" is a river full of water to the brink of its bed or channel, if not even in flood (Ps. lxxv. 9).

(2) An old jocular name for a jurymen.

II. Ecclesiast. & Ch. Hist.: The appellation, derived from Anglo-Saxon, for one of the sponsors who take vows upon themselves when they bring an infant to be baptized. Their first appointment is attributed to Hyginus, a Roman bishop, about A. D. 154, his object being to provide some security for the Christian uprearing of the child if the parents were cut off in a persecution then in progress. Some, however, think that the Jews had sponsors in connection with the circumcision of children; others that their introduction into the Church arose from the legislation of the Roman civil code. In 813 the Council of Metz prohibited parents from acting as sponsors for their children. The Council of Trent, in 1545, limited the number of sponsors to one or two.

4. Of the highest excellence; preeminently good.

"The woman's cause is man's: they sink or rise Together, dwarfed or godlike, bond or free." Tennyson: Princess, vii. 244.

† Crabb thus discriminates between godlike, divine and heavenly: "Godlike is a more expressive, but less common term than divine; the former is used only as an epithet of peculiar praise for an individual; divine is generally employed for that which appertains to a superior being, in distinction from that which is human. As divine is opposed to human, so is heavenly to earthly; the Divine Being distinguishes the Creator from all other beings; but a heavenly being denotes the angels or inhabitants of heaven, in distinction from earthly beings or the inhabitants of earth." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

C. As substantive:

1. The act of walking or moving in any way.

2. A departure.

"And yet this is a wonder most of all,
Why thou thus sorrowest, seth thou wost nat yet Touching her going, how that it shal fal."—Chaucer: Troilus, bk. iv.

3. A wandering or departure from the right way.

"Compare the Pope's doctrine to the word of God, and thou shalt finde that there hath ben, and yet is a great going out of the way."—Tyndall: Workes, p. 182.

4. Procedure; course or manner of life; conduct; behavior. (Usually in the plural.)

"His eyes are on the ways of man, and he seeth all his goings."—Job xxxiv. 20.

5. A state or time of pregnancy; gestation.

"The time of death has a far greater latitude than that of our birth: most women coming, according to their reckoning, within the compass of a fortnight; that is, the twentieth part of their going."—Grew: Cosmologia Sacra.

6. The state or condition of the ground or course on which a race is run.

"Thanks to a complete system of drainage, the going was wonderfully clean for the time of year."—London Daily Telegraph.

going-barrel, s.

Horology:

1. A barrel containing a mainspring, and having a cog-wheel on its periphery which drives the train. It supercedes the arrangement of chain and fusee.

2. A ratchet-wheel with pawl and spring on the shaft of the great wheel, by which the works are kept going while the clock is being wound up.

going-forth, s.

1. A departure, a setting out.

2. A limit, a bound, a border.

"And your border shall turn . . . and the going-forth thereof shall be from the south to Kadeschbarnea."—Numbers xxxiv. 4.

1. A departure or journeying.

"And Moses wrote their goings-out according to their journeys."—Numbers xxxiii. 2.

*2. An extreme point or limit; a border.

"And the border shall fetch a compass . . . and the goings-out of it shall be at the sea."—Numbers xxxiv. 6.

going-wheel, s. An arrangement invented by Huyghens to keep a clock in motion while winding.

goings-on, s. pl. Behavior, actions, conduct. (Generally in a bad sense.)

"Pretty place it must be where they don't admit women. Nice goings-on, I daresay, Mr. Caudle."—D. Jerrold: Mrs. Caudle, lect. viii.

gōi-tēred, gōi-tred (tred as tērd), a. [Eng. goitre; -ed.] Affected with, or suffering from goiter.

gōi-tēr, gōi-tre (tre as tēr), s. [Fr. goitre, from Lat. guttur=the throat.]

Pathol.: The same as BRONCHOCELE (q. v.). It arises from a morbid enlargement of the thyroid gland, causing an unsightly, but painless, deformity. It is more common among women than among men, in the proportion of about twelve to one. It prevails chiefly, if not exclusively, in villages situated upon or close to limestone rocks.

gōi-trōus, a. [Fr. goitreux.] [GOITER.]

1. Pertaining to goiter; of the nature of goiter.

2. Affected with or suffering from goiter; goitered.

gō-kūm-ite (o as e), s. [From Gökum in Finland, where it occurs.]

Min.: A variety of Idocrase named by Dana Vesuvianite. Gökumite is the same as LOBOITE and GAHNITE (q. v.).

gōk-ŷ, s. [GAWKY.] A fool; a stupid fellow.

gō-la, s. [Ital., from Lat. gula=the throat.]

Arch.: A molding, more commonly called cyma. "In a cornice the gola, or cymatium of the corona, the coping, the modillions or dentelli, make a noble show."—Addison: Spectator, No. 415.

gō-lan-dāuge, s. [Hind. golandāz.] A native artilleryman. [ANGLO-INDIAN.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) In the same sense as II. 3.

(2) Gold coin.

2. Figuratively:

(1) Money, riches, wealth.

"For me, the gold of France did not seduce."

Shakesp.: Henry V., ii. 2.

(2) Used as a symbol of anything very valuable or greatly prized; as, a heart of gold.

(3) A bright yellow color, like that of gold.

II. Technically:

1. Chem.: A triatomic metallic element, symbol Au; atomic weight, 196; specific gravity, 19'26; melting point about 1240°, forming a green fluid which volatilizes at a higher temperature. Gold is a metal of a bright yellow color, and was compared to the sun by the alchemists. It is very ductile; a grain of it can be drawn into a wire 500 feet long, and will gild two miles of fine silver wire. It is also very malleable; one grain can be beaten out to cover an area of 56'75 square inches. Thin gold-leaf appears green by transmitted light. The red color of ruby glass is due to metallic gold in an extreme state of division. Gold does not oxidize or tarnish in the air, and is not acted upon by oxygen or water at any temperature; it is not dissolved by sulphuric, nitric, or hydrochloric acid, but is dissolved by aqua regia, a mixture of nitric and hydrochloric acids. Gold crystallizes in cubes, octahedra, and other forms belonging to a regular system. Gold forms two series of salts, Aurous and Auric (q. v.); it has been detected in sea water. Gold is extracted from the quartz ore by pulverizing it, and adding mercury containing a small quantity of sodium; the amalgam is then heated to drive off the mercury; auriferous pyrites are roasted to drive off sulphur and arsenic before they are treated with the amalgam. Gold can be purified by melting it along with borax in a clay crucible, glazed inside with borax, and passing chlorine gas through the melted metal by means of a tobacco-pipe stem; the other metals are converted into chlorides, which rise to the surface. When the operation is finished, the gold is allowed to cool, and the fused chlorides poured off. Pure gold is prepared by dissolving the metal in a mixture of nitric and hydrochloric acids: the solution is evaporated to get rid of the nitric acid, then diluted with water and filtered; the gold is then precipitated by ferrous sulphate. $2AuCl_3 + 6FeSO_4 = Au_2 + Fe_2Cl_6 + 2Fe_2(SO_4)_3$. Gold can be separated from silver by heating it with two and a half times its weight of concentrated sulphuric acid, specific gravity 1'84, till no more SO_2 is given off. The alloy must not contain more than 25 per cent. of gold; if it does it must be melted with silver before the operation; the sulphuric acid attacks the silver and copper, converting them into sulphates; the gold is allowed to settle, and then the silver is precipitated by metallic copper from the decanted liquid. The presence of small quantities of tin and antimony in gold renders it brittle; they can be removed by heating the gold with ten per cent. of oxide of copper and a small quantity of borax. Pure gold is a very soft metal, therefore it is alloyed with silver, which gives it a greenish-yellow tint, or with copper, which gives it a yellowish-red color.

2. Pharm.: Gold has been used in medicine for scrofulous diseases; it appears to act like mercury. Gold terechloride is very poisonous, acting like corrosive sublimate. Gold leaf is used by dentists for filling teeth.

3. Min.: A metal crystallizing isometrically in octahedrons or dodecahedrons, as well as acicular, filiform, reticulated, arborescent, and spongiform shapes. There are four varieties, (1) Ordinary, and (2) Argentiferous Gold or Electrum, (3) Palladium Gold or Porposite, (4) Rhodium Gold. The gold product of this country far exceeds that of any other land. Almost every state and territory in the Union has yielded its share of the precious metal. Billions of dollars worth of gold have and are being mined at the national mints. By far the largest portions have come from California, which has long been known the world over as "the bright land of gold." The discovery that led to the memorable "gold fever" of 1849, took place Feb. 1, 1848, on the property of Colonel Sutter, near Coloma, El Dorado County, Cal. The condition of things resulting from this discovery was quite romantic. In 1849, California gold dust was worth $12 per oz., in cash, and between $15 and $17 in trade at the stores. The tariff on ordinary commodities reached a phenomenal and curious height. A suit of clothes cost $225; a shirt, $30; a pair of shoes, $50; a hat, $25; a pair of trousers, $45; coat and vest, $75; a comb, $5; a toothbrush, $5; a can of peaches, $15; a can of oysters, $5; a barrel of pork, $225.

On the continent of Europe, in Russia, in Australia, and in Africa, gold is still found in abundance. Every effort has been made to save the fine or "flour gold" that escapes from the mountains through the streams. As yet these efforts have not been very successful.

4. Geol.: It has been found in slate, quartzite, sandstone, limestone, granite, and serpentine. In many cases it occurs in veins of quartz, but much more accessibly in drifts, which the breaking up of those quartz veins has helped to produce. In the Ural Mountains the drift is Newer Pliocene, having in it bones of the mammoth, &c.; in California it is of two different ages, but both, geologically viewed, comparatively recent; when in veins, it is more frequently found in the paleozoic than in the secondary or tertiary strata. In most cases the veins are near plutonic rocks.

5. Hist.: Gold is mentioned in the Bible as early as Gen. ii. 12. The Hebrew word is zahab, from zahab=to shine, to be brilliant. As the names of gold in the Aryan languages (Lat. aurum, Gr. chrysos), differ from this, gold may perhaps not have been discovered till after the separation of the Aryan and Semitic races.

6. Coinage, Art, &c.: Gold was first coined in England in A. D. 1257.

7. Bot. (of the form gold):

- (1) The Turnsole (Heliotropium).
- (2) The Corn Marigold (Chrysanthemum segetum).

"She sprang up out of the molde
Into a flour, was named golde, Which slant governed of the sonne."

Gower, ii. 356.

(3) The Wild Myrtle.

(4) Calendula officinalis.

8. Archery: The exact center of a target, so called because marked with gold, or of a gold color.

"Miss—had the skill to forestall the general distribution by securing three golde at one end."—Field, Oct. 27, 1883.

B. As adjective:

1. Made of or consisting of gold.

"In the sandy slope, near the shore, at the head of the bay, the beautiful gold armillæ were found."—Wilson: Prehistoric Annals of Scotland, ii. 251.

2. Pertaining to or connected with gold or gold coin.

"The gold withdrawal, too, helped to depress home securities."—London Daily Telegraph.

gold-alloy, s. An alloy in which other metals are added to gold to confer hardness, as in coin, or to cheapen the product, as in some jewelers' alloys and solders.

gold-amalgam, s.

Min.: A mineral composed of mercury, 57.40; gold, 38.39; and silver, 5. It is found in Columbia in white grains about the size of a pea, and in California in yellowish-white, four-sided prisms. (Dana.)

gold-beating, s. The act or trade of beating out gold for gilding.

gold-blocking, s. Pressure of an engraved or composed block upon a book-cover. Without the leaf it is called blind-blocking.

"In Eliza's golden days, a knight Came on a war-horse sumptuously attired."
Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. vii.

golden-age, s. The earliest period in the mythological history of almost all nations, in which those then existing were supposed to live in perfect innocence and the enjoyment of every pleasure, and when the earth produced all things necessary for their support, comfort, or enjoyment in the fullest abundance, and all animals were at peace with each other. The Egyptians believed in successive conflagrations and deluges occurring at uncertain intervals. These were designed by the gods to purify the earth from guilt. After each of these judgments man was again so regenerated as to live for a time in a state of virtue and happiness, after which degeneracy again established itself, continually gaining strength till the next catastrophe.

"The golden age was first, when man, yet new,
No rule but uncorrupted Reason knew;
And, with a native bent, did good pursue."
Dryden: The Golden Age.

golden-apple, s.

Bot.: Citrus aurantium.

golden-balls, s. pl. The three gilt balls suspended as a sign in the front of a pawnbroker's place of business. Some historians say they were derived from the arms of Lombardy, Lombards having been the first bankers and moneylenders in London. Others credit a doctor with having first used the three balls as a sign, they being hung out to represent pills.

golden-beetle, s.

Entom.: Various species of Chrysomela, or of the family Chrysomelidae. They are so called from their metallic luster. The color thus reflected is generally golden-green, scarlet, azure, or blue.

golden-bug, s.

Entom.: A beetle (Coccinella septempunctata), the Seven-spotted Ladybird.

golden-bull, s.

Hist.: A bull having a golden seal, issued by the German emperor, Charles IV. at the Diet of Nuremberg in 1356, and which became the fundamental law of the empire over which he ruled. Other bulls have also been called golden for a similar reason.

golden-carp, s. [GOLD-CARP.]golden-chain, s.

Bot.: The Laburnum, Cytisus laburnum.

golden-club, s.

Bot.: Orotium aquaticum, or the genus Orotium itself.

golden-crested, a. Having a crest or top-knot of gold or of a golden color.

Golden-crested wren:

Ornith.: Regulus cristatus. A beautiful little bird, the upper parts olive-green; the head ornamented with an orange-yellow crest, bordered with black, whence it has sometimes been called R. curicapillus; the lower parts yellowish-grey. Length about 3½ inches. It exists in flocks, often along with titmice and creepers, in firwoods, remaining all the year around.

golden-crown, s.

Bot.: Chrysosystema.

golden-cup, s.

Bot.: The same as GOLD-CUP (q. v.).

golden-eagle, s.

Ornith.: Aquila chrysaetos. [EAGLE.]

golden-ear, s.

Entom.: A moth, Hydræcia nictitans, family Apamiæ.

golden-eye, s.

Ornith.: Clangula, a genus of Anatidæ (Ducks).

golden-fingered, a. Having golden fingers in a figurative sense.

"Golden-fingered Ind."—Marlowe. (Trench.)

golden-fleece, s.

Class. Myth.: The fleece of gold taken from the ram on which Phryxus was transported through the air to Colchis, and in quest of which the Argonauts sailed under the leadership of Jason.

¶ Order of the Golden Fleece:

Her.: An order of knighthood instituted in 1429 by Philip the Good, Duke of Burgundy. In process of time the operation of hereditary descent brought the families of Spain and Austria into the order, which now is common to both these countries.

golden-flower, s.

Bot.: The genus Chrysanthemum.

golden-fly, s.

Entom.: Chrysis, a genus of Hymenoptera, possessed of metallic brilliancy, reflected from green, ruby tint, &c.

golden-grease, s. A fee, a bribe.golden-hair, s.

Bot.: Chrysocoma comarea.

golden-horde, s.

Hist.: The tribe of Mongolian Tartars, which about 1724 established itself in Southern Russia.

golden-knop, s.

Entom.: The same as GOLDEN-BUG (q. v.).

golden-legend, s. The Aurea legenda of the middle ages, a work written by James de Voragine, Archbishop of Genoa, in the end of the thirteenth century. It is a hagiology or collection of lives of saints, and descriptions and histories of festivals. A translation of it was made and printed by Caxton in A. D. 1483. Longfellow made a portion of it popular by his poem of the same name.

golden-lungwort, s.

Botany: Hieracium aurantiacum, a composite plant.

golden-maid, s.

Ichthy.: Crenilabrus melops; called also the Gilt-head and Connor.

golden-maidenhair, s.

Bot.: Polytrichum commune, one of the finest of mosses, with almost woody stems and large, firm leaves. It is found on heaths and mountain tracts. It is sometimes made into brooms.

golden-marcasite, s. An old name for tin.golden-mean, s.

I. Ord. Lang.: A state of competence, in which one is neither burdened with the cares of riches nor depressed by the necessities of poverty.

"Where'er he shines, oh Fortune, gild the scene,
And angels guard him in the golden-mean!"
Pope: Moral Essays, iii. 147.

II. Ethics: This term appears to have been adopted into the English language from Horace (Odes ii. 10, 5), though there the poet is speaking of worldly circumstances [i.] rather than of moral duties. We find the virtue of moderation taught in Hesiod, and Cooke renders the passage:

"Let every action prove a mean confessed
A moderation is in all the best."

Similar teaching may be found in the writings of Plato and Aristotle, and the latter lays it down in his Ethics that every virtue is a mean between two vices.

golden-mole, s.

Zool.: Chrysochloris aureus, one of the Talpidæ (Moles). The hairs of the fur so disperse the light as to produce metallic reflections. It is found in Africa.

golden-mouse-ear, s.

Bot.: A composite plant, Hieracium pilosella, called in books the Common Mouse-ear Hawkweed. [HAWKWEED, HIERACIUM.]

golden-mouthed, a.

1. Eloquent: a translation of the Gr. chrysostomos, whence the name Chrysostom, from chrysos=gold, and stoma=a mouth.

2. Musical, melodious.

"A cry of love that rang
As from a trumpet golden-mouthed."
A. C. Swinburne: Tristram of Lyonesse, viii.

golden-number, s.

Chron.: A number, so called from being marked in ancient calendars in letters of gold. It indicated the number of any year in the cycle of the moon. After every nineteen years the various aspects of the moon are within an hour the same as they were when the cycle commenced. This was known at an early period, and the nineteen years' lunar cycle was adopted B. C. 433. To find the golden number of any particular year, make the accepted time of our Lord's birth B. C. 4, the first year of a cycle; add one to the year for which the golden number is required, and divide by twenty; the quotient will be the number of lunar cycles from the birth of Christ, and the remainder, if any, will be the golden number.

golden-pert, s.

Bot.: Gratiola aurea.

golden-pheasant, s.

Ornith.: [GOLD-PHEASANT.]

golden-pippin, s. A species of apple, so named from its color.

golden-robin, s.

¶ Rayless Golden-rod is the American name for Bigelovia; Golden-rod tree, or Tree golden-rod, is Bosca Yervomora.

golden-rose, s. A rose of gold, or gilded, supposed to represent by its gold, its odor, and its balm, the Godhead, the body, and the soul of the Redeemer. It was sent at intervals by the Pope to sovereigns supposed to be more loyal than others to the Holy See. Among those sent were one to Henry VIII., in 1510; one to Frederick the Wise of Saxony, in 1519, to wean him from friendship with Luther; to Charles IX. of France, in 1572, just after the "massacre of St. Bartholomew;" one to the Queen of Spain in 1683; and more recently to Eugénie, while Empress of the French.

*1. Arith.: A rule, so called on account of its excellent use in arithmetic, and especially in ordinary calculations, by which numbers are found in certain proportions—viz., having three numbers given to find a fourth number in proportion. (Hutton: Math. Dict.) [PROPORTION, RULE OF THREE.]

*2. Morals: The rule laid down by Jesus in the Sermon on the Mount, and stated by Him to be the law and the prophets—i. e., a summary of their teaching: "Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them" (Matt. vii. 12). This rule, almost axiomatic to a mind of keen moral sensitiveness, had already been "examined and adopted as a standard of ethics by westerns like Socrates and easterns like Theng-tsen, the disciple and friend of Confucius, some centuries before the birth of Christ. The latter tells us Toen-kousy asked, Is there a word in the language which is of itself enough for a guide for our life? The wise man answered, There is; the word Chon, of which the meaning is that what we would should not be done to us let us not do to others."

golden-samphire, s.

Bot.: Inula crithmoides.

golden-saxifrage, s.

Bot.: The genus Chrysosplenium.

golden-slopt, a. Wearing gold buskins.

golden-sulphide, s. [GOLDEN-SULPHURET.]

golden-sulphuret, s. [Golden Sulphuret of Antimony.]

Golden Sulphuret of Antimony:

Chem.: Sulphur antimonii auratum. Pentasulphide of antimony, Sb₂S₅.

golden-swift, s.

Entom.: A moth, Hepiatus humuli, family Hepialidæ.

golden-teeth, s. pl. The teeth of herbivorous animals coated, as they sometimes are, with a yellow precipitate. (Rossiter.)

golden-thistle, s.

Bot.: (1) Scolymus, (2) Protea scolymus.

golden-tressed, a. Having fair or golden-colored tresses; golden-haired; (fig.) shining with bright rays.

"And caused the golden-tressed sun
All the day long his course to run."

Milton: Trans. of Psalm cxxvi.

golden-trumpeter, s.

Ornith.: A South American bird, the Agami (Psophia crepitans), which emits a deep, rough sound, suggesting that of a trumpet. [AGAMI.]

golden-wasps, s. pl.

Entom.: One of the popular names for the hymenopterous genus Chrysis, or the family of which it is the type. They are not genuine wasps, one difference between the two being that the wasps proper have a sting, and the "golden wasps" only an ovipositor. [CHRYSIDIDÆ, CHRYSIDÆ.]

golden-wedding, s. The fiftieth anniversary of a wedding, which is usually observed with more than ordinary festivity. The presents given to the couple should all be of gold.

göld-läce, s. [Eng. gold, and lace.] A kind of lace made of gold wire, flattened between two polished steel rollers, into a ribbon which is twisted round a core of silk.

göld-läced, a. [Eng. gold, and laced.] Ornamented or embroidered with goldlace.

göld-läef, s. [Eng. gold, and leaf.] Fine gold beaten into thin leaves. A small percentage of silver and copper is added to the gold for beating, about 1½ per cent. of alloy. The ingot is rolled into a ribbon by repeated passage between rollers, and this ribbon has a thickness of $\frac{1}{16}$ of an inch, a surface of five hundred square inches to an ounce of gold. It is then cut into pieces of about an inch square, placed between pieces of goldbeater's skin four inches square, and beaten with a ponderous hammer on a smooth marble slab until the gold has thinned and expanded to the size of the vellum. Each piece of gold is then again divided into four, placed between pieces of goldbeater's skin as before, and again beaten till it expands to the size of the skin. A third and a fourth beating follow, until the gold has been reduced to the necessary degree of thinness. The hammers vary in degrees of heaviness. [GOLDBEATER'S HAMMER.] An ounce of gold in the form of a cube, $\frac{5}{16}$ lines in length, breadth, and thickness can be so extended by the goldbeaters as to cover a surface of more than 1,466½ square feet.

Elect. Mach.: An instrument for ascertaining, by means of goldleaf, the presence of electricity in a body. There is a tubular glass shade standing on a metallic foot in contact with the ground. In the tubule of the shade, the neck of which is coated with insulating varnish, there fits a metal rod, terminating at the upper extremity in a knob, and holding at the lower end two narrow strips of gold-leaf. The air in the interior is dried by quicklime or chloride of calcium. When the knob is touched with a body charged with positive or negative electricity the leaves diverge. To ascertain the kind of electricity requires a more intricate process.

göld-lëss, a. [Eng. gold; -less.] Destitute of gold.

göld-nëy, göld-nŷ, s. [Eng. golden, and suff. -y(?).]

Ichthy.: The Golden Wrasse (Crenilabrus tinca). It is one of the fishes called the Gilthead (q. v.).

"The goldny of Cilicia, Chios scallops."—Davies: An Ecstacy, p. 94.

göld-sín-nŷ, s. [GOLDFINNY.]

göld-smith, gold-smeth, gold-smithe, gold-smyth, s. [A. S. goldsmith; O. H. Ger. gold-smid; Dut. goudsmid; Icel. gullsmidhr; Dan. & Sw. guldsmid.]

1. An artisan who manufactures articles in gold; a worker in gold.

"I promised your presence and the chain,
But neither chain nor goldsmith came to me."
—Shakesp.: Comedy of Errors, iv. 1.

göld-stick, s. [Eng. gold, and stick.] A court official, so called from the gilt rod or wand borne by him when in attendance on the sovereign on state occasions.

göld-thrëad, s. [Eng. gold, and thread.]

1. Ord. Lang.: A flattened, silver-gilt wire, wrapped or laid on a thread of yellow silk by twisting with a wheel or bobbins; also called gold-wire or spun-gold.

2. Bot.: Coptis trifolia, a ranunculaceous evergreen, so called from its yellow fibrous roots.

göld-wire, s. [English gold, and wire.] Gold reduced to the form of wire. Goldwire, so called, has usually a core of silver, and is made by preparing a round bar of silver, plating it thickly with gold, and then drawing it through a series of holes of gradually decreasing diameter. The gold may be $\frac{1}{16}$ of the thickness of the silver at first, and shares all its mutations in the drawing, retaining the same relative thickness.

göld-ŷ-löcks, s. [GOLDISLOCKS.]

göld-ŷ-löcked, a. [Eng. goldy, lock (s); -ed.] Golden-haired; having a profusion of beautiful auburn hair.

"Thence it fled forth, and made quick transmigration To godly-looked Euphorbus."
—Ben Jonson: The Fox, i. 1.

golf, goif, goiff, gouff, s. [Dut. kolf=a club to strike balls with; cogn. with Icel. kólf=a clapper of a bell, a bolt; kylfa=a club; Ger. kolbe=a club, a mace.]

1. A game extensively played in Scotland, and of late years introduced into this country. It is played with club-headed sticks and very hard small balls, on a large common or down, technically called links, in which small holes have been made at distances of from 100 to 500 yards apart, according to the extent of the ground. The game, which may be played by two persons, or by four (two against two), consists in driving the ball into each of the holes in succession in as few strokes as possible; the side making the round, that is, placing his or their ball in each hole successively in the fewest strokes, winning the game.

"That the futball and golf be vterly cryit downe, and not to be visit."—Act Jas. II. (1457), c. 71.

*2. A blow, a stroke.

"She lends me a gouf, and tells me I'm douf,

Göl-gö-tha, s. [Gr. Golgotha, from Aramean Gulgaltá; Heb. Gulgoleth=a skull (Luke xxiii. 33), or the place of a skull (Matt. xxvii. 33, Mark xv. 22, John xix. 17).] A charnel-house.

Gö-ll-ard, gol-l-ar-deis, gol-y-ar-deys, s. [GOLIAS.]

Ch. Hist.: One of the authors of the poems bearing the name of Golias (q. v.), hence generally a writer of satirical poetry; a satirist.

"The Goliards became a kind of monkish rhapsodists, the companions and rivals of the jongleurs (the reciters of the merry and licentious fableaux)."—Milman: Latin Christianity, ix. 189.

Gö-ll-ard-ër-ŷ, s. [GOLIAS.]

Ch. Hist.: The name given to the series of satirical Latin poems directed against the abuses of the Roman Church in the thirteenth century. Wright considers them to have been the immediate predecessors, and in some sense the cause, of the Cycle of Piers the Ploughman and of the writings of Wycliffe, and thus to have contributed to the Reformation. From a classical standpoint, the majority of them are generally below criticism; from a moral point of view they are vigorous and healthy, though in studying them nineteenth-century readers must bear in mind the great jealousy of monastic orders which has in all ages existed among the secular clergy, and the tendency in minds ecclesiastical to exaggerate into grave sins what ordinary men would be inclined to consider as mere peccadilloes. With this preface, a few lines from the Inuective of Golias against the Cistercians may be quoted:

"Nil nisi presentia sitiunt aut querunt;
Farcunt marsupia, metant que non serunt;
Panperum penuria esse dixerunt Satana mancipia sunt et semper erunt."

Occasionally Golias seems to have relinquished his moral mission, and to have degenerated into a convivial rhymester; of this style examples may be found in Longfellow's Golden Legend (iv.), where Lucifer, disguised as a friar, finds admission to the refectory. These verses are genuine products of the late Middle Ages. A less-known example from the Confessio Golias runs thus:

"Mih nonquam spiritus poetrie datur
Nisi tunc cum fuerit venter bene satur
Cum in arce cerebri Bacchus dominatur
In me Phœbus irruit et miranda fatur."

These poems are rhymed, but now and again there crops up evidence that the writer was capable of better things. For example, in the Prædicatione Golias one meets with lines like these:

"Et ne forte cogita 'Vivam decem annis Tunc me vilioribus castigabo pannis, Cum induar vestibus Pauli vel Joannis'" and then, by a marvelous compensation, a dainty classic gem:

"Sic expectat rusticus, sed defluat annis," which, by its brilliance, almost compensates for the tawdriness of the setting.

Gö-ll-äs, s. [For etym. see def.]

Ch. Hist.: The name under which certain satirical poems on ecclesiastical subjects were given to böil, boý; pöut, jöw!; cat, cell, chorus, chin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f.

-clan, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shün; -tion, -gion = zhün. -tious, -cious, -sious = shüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bəl, dəl.

the world in the thirteenth century. Many of them have been attributed to Walter de Mafes, though there is little ground for this opinion. Wright considers Goliath to be a pseudonym, "apparently from gula, and having nothing in common with the French gaillard." (Latin Poems attributed to Walter de Mafes, xii.) Du Cange, in support of the opinion that Goliath was a real personage, quotes Silvester Giraldus:

"Parasitus quidam Goliath nomine . . . qui Goliath melius, quia gula et crapule per omnia deditus, dici potuit."—Speculum Ecclesie, lib. iv., cap. xvi.

The balance of testimony, however, inclines to the view advanced by Wright:

"Goliath, the burlesque representative of the clerical order, the instrument through which their vices were satirized."—Wright: Latin Poems attributed to Walter de Mafes, xii.

Gō-lī-ath, s. [Hebrew Goleath=the celebrated giant of Gath whom David slew (1 Sam. xv. 1-54).] (For def. see compound.)

gōm-phrē-nē-ā, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. gomphren(a), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -æ.]

Bot.: A tribe of Amaranthaceæ.

gō-mū-tī, gō-mū-tō, s. [Malayan.]

1. Bot.: The Areng Palm, Saguerus saccharifer, common in the southern Asiatic islands.

2. Comm.: The same as GOMUTI-FIBER (q. v.).

gomuti-fiber, s.

Comm.: The fiber of the Gomuti, or Areng. It is derived from the leaf-stalks which it surrounds, is black, and like horsehair. It is used for cordage, for thatching, &c. It is called also Ejoo.

gōn-āds, s. pl. The generative glands; the germ glands.

gōn-ā-grā, s. [Gr. gonagra, see def., from gonu=the knee, and agra=a catching.]

Pathol.: The name given by the old Greek physicians to gout in the knee. (Parr, Tanner, &c.) gōn-ā-kle, s. [Ah African word.]

Bot.: Acacia Adansonii. It yields good timber.

gon, v. i. [Go, v.]

gō-nān-gī-ūm, s. [Greek gonos=offspring, seed, and angeion=a vessel.]

Zool.: The chitinous receptacle in which the reproductive buds of certain hydrozoa are produced.

gōn-dō-lā, gon-dole, gun-da-loe, s. [Ital. dimin. of gonda=a boat; from Gr. kōndu=a drinking-vessel, from the shape.]

1. A Venetian boat. A gondola of middle size is thirty feet long, four feet beam, and is rowed by one man, known as a gondolier, standing at the stern and using one oar, or by two men, one at each end, both using a single oar. It has seats amidships, some of which have covers. In Venice they are all painted black. The stem and stern rise in pointed elevations, the former being surmounted by the ferro, a bright iron cleaver.

2. A flat-bottomed boat for carrying produce and goods.

3. A railway-platform car, with low or no sides.

gōn-dō-lēt, s. [A dimin. from gondola (q. v.).] A little gondola. (Moore.)

gōn-dō-liēr, gun-de-lier, s. [Ital. gondoliere.] A man that rows a gondola.

gone, gon, pa. par. & a. [Go, v.]

A. As pa. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As adjective:

1. Ordinary Language:

1. Departed, moved, or started away.

2. Dead, departed, deceased.

"A dog, that has his nose held in the vapor, loses all signs of life; but carried into the air, or thrown into a lake, recovers, if not quite gone."—Addison: On Italy.

3. Departed; lost.

"Speech is confined to the living, and imparted to only those that are in presence, and is transient and gone."—Holder: On the Classics.

4. Ruined, undone.

"He must know 'tis none of your daughter nor my sister; we are gone else."—Shakespeare: Winter's Tale, iv. 3.

5. Advanced; forward in progress.

"I have known sheep cured of the rot, when they have not been far gone with it, only by being put into broomlands."—Mortimer: Husbandry.

II. Archery: Applied to an arrow shot beyond the mark.

gone-nēss, s. Faintness, exhaustion; more frequently used in connection with lack of food. (U.S. slang.)

gon-el, s. [O. Fr. gonelle, gonele; Prov. gonel, gonella; Ital. gonnella, from O. Fr. gone, Prov. gona, Ital. gonna, Low Lat. guna, gunna, Gael. gùn, Wel. gwn=a gown (q. v.).] A mantle, a cloak.

gōn-ēp-tēr-ŷx, s. [Greek gōnia=a corner, an angle, or gonu=a knee, and ptērux=a wing.]

Entom.: A genus of butterflies, family Papilionidae, sub-family Pieridi. Gonepteryx rhamni is the Brimstone Butterfly. Its wings have an angular projection [etym.], and are brimstone-colored. Expansion of wings about 2½ inches. It is velvety-looking, dark green, with a pale line on each side. (Stainton, &c.)

gon-fa-lōn, gōn-fa-nōn, gof-fa-noun, gon-fa-noun, gon-fa-nun, gon-fay-noun, gon-fe-noun, goun-fa-noun, gun-fa-noun, gun-fan-un, s. [Old French gunfauan, gonfanon; Fr. gonfalon; Sp. confalon; Ital. gonfalone, from M. H. Ger. gunfano=a battle standard, from gunt, gund=battle, and fano, vano (Ger. fahne)=a banner.] A small flag fixed to the pole of a lance. It differed from a banner in this respect, that, instead of being square, and fastened to a tonsure bar, the gonfalon, though of the same figure, was fixed in a frame made to turn like a modern ship's vane, with two or three streamers or tails. The object of the gonfalon was principally to render great people more conspicuous to their followers, and to terrify the horses of their adversaries.

"Standards and gonfalons 'twixt van and rear Stream in the air."

Milton: P. L., v. 689.

Gonfalon.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, there; pīne, pīt, sire, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite. cūr, rūle, fūll; trŷ, sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

gon-fa-lôn-lér, s. [Italian gonfaloniere.] A standard-bearer; the person intrusted with the public gonfalon in medieval Italian cities.

"Was not the rotation, too, provided for by the annual election of her gonfalonieri?"—Bp. Wren: Monarchy Ascerted, ch. x. (1659).

gong (1), gonge, goung, s. [A. S. gang=a going, a passage, a privy.] [GANG.]

1. Going, motion.

"Honden butes felinge, fet bute gonge."

Legend of St. Katharine, 499.

2. A privy, a jakes, a house of office.

"As he com bi a gong Amide the pit he hit slong."

Seven Sages, 1,815.

3. A pit.

"In helle gonge to ly on grounde."

Coventry Mysteries, p. 345.

gong-farmer, s. A night man; a cleaner of privies or cesspools.

gong-man, gang-man, s. A gong-farmer.

gong (2), s. [Malay gongg, gong=a gong.]

*1. (See extract.)

"There is one that strikes on a small gong, or a wooden instrument, before every stroke of the oar, then the rowers answer all at once with a sort of a hollow noise, through the throat, and a stamp on the deck with one foot, and immediately plunge their oars into the water. Thus the gong and the rowers alternately answer each other, making a sound that seems very pleasant and warlike to those who are at a small distance on the water or shore."—Dampier: Voyage, Tonquin (an. 1686).

2. A musical instrument used principally in the East. It is tambourine-shaped, a disc of thin bronze with an upturned flange forming a rim. The metal consists of seventy-eight parts copper, twenty-two parts tin. The bronze is of such proportions as to be naturally brittle when cast. Gongs are beaten with a padded drumstick, and are used in the East for making signals, and adding intensity to the clangor of martial music. The gong has no distinct or appreciable note, but gives out a sound consisting of a combination of harmonics.

"And loud, amid the universal clamor,

O'er distant deserts sounds the Tartar gong."

Longfellow: Arsenal at Springfield.

3. A stationary bell whose tongue is moved by a wire or string. Commonly used as an alarm or call-bell on steamers.

gong-gong, s. A gong.

gong-metal, s. The metal of which gongs are made.

gôn-gôn-ha, s. [A Brazilian word.]

Bot.: A kind of holly, Ilex gongonha, used in Brazil for making tea. It is diuretic and diaphoretic.

gôn-gôr-e, s. [Named after Antony Caballero y Góngora, formerly viceroy of New Granada.]

Bot.: A fine genus of orchids, tribe Vandæ. They have lance-shaped leaves more than a foot long, and drooping flower racemes two feet. About twelve species are known. They grow on stems in tropical America.

gôn-gyl-ite, s. [Gr. gongylos=round, and suff. -ite (Min.) (q. v.).]

Min.: A yellowish or yellowish-brown variety of Agalmatolite, from Finland.

gôn-gyl-ô-spër-më, s. pl. [Gr. gongylos=round, sperma=seed, and Latin pl. fem. adj. suff. -eæ.]

Botany: A collection of rose-spored Algae. The spores are collected without order in a mucous or membranaceous mother-cell. The nucleus is sometimes compound.

gôn-gyl-lüs (pl. gôn-gyl-li), s. [Gr. gongylos=round.]

Botany:

1. A spore of certain fungi.

2. A round, hard, deciduous body connected with the reproduction of certain sea-weeds.

3. One of the granules contained in the shields of certain lichens.

gô-ni-âs-tër, s. [Gr. gônia=an angle, and astër=a star.]

1. Zool.: A genus of Echinoderms, order Asteroidea.

2. Palæont.: It came into existence at least as early as the Jurassic period.

gô-ni-a-tite, gô-ni-a-ti-tës, s. [As if from a Mod. Lat. term goniatites. Gr. gônia=an angle, and suff. -ites, or -i may be euphonic.]

Palæontology, Geology, &c.:

1. (Of the form goniatites): A genus of Ammonitidae. It has a discoidal shell, lobed sutures, and the siphuncle dorsal. Known species 197, from the Upper Silurian to the Trias.

2. (Of the form goniatite): The English name for any species of the genus Goniatites (q. v.).

gô-ni-a-tit-i-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. goniatit(es), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Palæontol.: A family of Cephalopods. Mr. S. Woodward does not recognize it, but leaves goniatites in the Ammonitidae.

gô-nid-i-a, s. pl. [Gr. gônidia, pl. of gônidon=a small corner or angle, dimin. of gônia=a corner, an angle.]

Bot.: The green spherical cells which exist in the thallus of lichens, and distinguish them from funguli. They are of various forms; they produce zoospores.

gô-nid-i-a-l, a. [Gr. gônidia and Eng. adj. suff. -al.]

Bot.: Of or belonging to Gonidia (q. v.).

gonidial-layer, s.

Bot.: A layer or zone of variable thickness, constituted by gonidia at the place where the cortex and medulla meet in the thallus of a lichen. (Thomé.)

gô-nim-i-a, s. pl. [Gr. gonimos=productive, from gone, that which generates.]

Bot.: The bluish-green granules which appear in certain lichens and replace the more common gonidia.

gô-ni-ôm-ô-tër, s. [Gr. gônia=a corner, an angle, and metron=a measure.]

Min. & Mach.: An instrument for measuring angles, and specially those of crystals. There are two forms of it, the common and the reflecting goniometer. The former was invented by Carangeau. Its principle is the movements of a movable arm constituting the radius of a graduated semicircle. It is best adapted to take the angles of a crystal free from the gangue, and even then is not very precise in its indications. It is now rarely if ever used.

The reflecting goniometer is founded on the reflecting power of the polish on the natural planes or fracture surfaces of minerals. In the figure a b is the principal circle graduated on one edge to half degrees, and divided for convenience into two parts of 180° each; c is a brass plate screwed upon and supported by the pillar d, and graduated as a vernier; f is the axle of the circle a b, and passes through the upper parts of the two pillars d e, the other ends of which are inserted into a wooden base m; g h is an axle inclosed within f, and turned by means of the smallest circle i, which communicates a motion to all the apparatus on the left of h, without moving the principal circle a b; k is a circle to which is attached the axle of the principal circle. Whenever a crystal is to be measured, it is attached by means of wax to one end of a plate of brass, n, the other end of the plate being placed in a slit in the upper part of the circular brass stem o, which passes through the tube p, to which it is so adjusted as to allow of being moved either up or down, or circularly by means of the circle q. The tube p is fixed to the curved brass plate r, which is attached, but so as to allow of motion, to another curved plate s, by means of a pin t; the other end of the latter plate being connected with the concealed axle g h, to which a motion is given by turning the half circle i. The stem o, which may be raised or depressed at pleasure, should be used to place the crystal as nearly as possible on a line with the inner axle. Let it now be supposed that the instrument is placed from eight to twenty feet distant from a window. Let a black line v be drawn on the wainscot between the window and the floor, and perfectly parallel with the horizontal base of the window. If then the eye be placed almost close to the crystal l, a reflection of one of the bars will be seen on one of its planes. Adjust it till it is parallel with the black line v. The crystal is then turned by turning the little circle i, until the reflection of the same bar is seen on the next plane perfectly on a line with and upon the black line v. Both reflections being kept accurate, it is next needful, by means of the circle k, to turn the principal circle until it is arrested by the stop x or the pillar d; it will then be found that 180°, or the principal circle, coincides with o on the vernier. If the circle k be then turned with the eye close to the crystals till the reflection of the same bar is seen on the adjoining plane precisely upon the black line v, the distance moved by the principal circle will indicate in degrees the angle of the crystal. The small crystals of bodies are generally more regular than the larger ones, and a surface of 1½ part of an inch in length if perfect and brilliant will be sufficiently large to be accurately measured by the reflecting goniometer. (W. Phillips.)

gô-ni-ô-mët-ric, gô-ni-ô-mët-ri-cal, a. [Eng. goniometr(y); -ic, -ical.] Pertaining to goniometry or goniometers; measured by a goniometer.

gô-ni-ôm-ô-trÿ, s. [Gr. gônia=an angle, and metron=a measure; Fr. gonimétrie.] The art or science of measuring solid angles.

gô-ni-ôph-ô-lis, s. [Greek gônia=a corner, an angle; and pholis=a horny scale of a reptile, in reference to the rectangular form, size, number, and firm junction of the osseous scales. (Owen.)]

Palæont.: A genus of fossil crocodiles, placed by Sir Richard Owen under his sub-order Amphicoelia, and by Professor Huxley doubtfully under that which he terms Mesosuchia. The remains on which the genus was founded were found in 1835 in a quarry near Swanage. The species is Goniopholis crassidens, sometimes called the Swanage Crocodile. (Mantell, Owen, &c.)

gô-nô-blas-tid-i-ôn (pl. gô-nô-blas-tid-i-a), s. [Gr. gonos=that which is begotten, a child, also seed, &c.; and dimin. of blastos=a sprout.]

Zool. (pl.): Special processes from the body-wall, or coenosarc, of Hydractinia, Dicyrnia and other Corynida. They are atrophied, or undeveloped, polypites, differing from perfect ones in being usually destitute of a mouth and in having shorter tentacles. They carry the reproductive receptacles or gonophores in certain hydrozoa. Allman calls them Blastostyles.

gô-nô-câl-ÿ-cine, a. [Mod. Latin gonocalyx (genit. gonocalycis) suff. -ine.]

Zool.: Of or belonging to a gonocalyx (q. v.).

"Disguised medusoids, in which there is a central manubrial process and a rudimentary system of gonocalycine canals."—Nicholson: Zool. (5th ed.), p. 110.

gô-nô-câ-lÿx, s. [Gr. gonos=a child, and Lat. calyx; Gr. kalyx=a covering.]

Zool.: A bell-shaped disc, attached by the base to the parent organism in the Corynida, the swimming-bell in a medusiform gonophore, or the same structure in a gonophore which is not detached. (Nicholson.)

gon-of, gon-oph, s. [A corrupt. of gone-off.] A thief, a pickpocket.

gô-nô-lô-bë-s, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. gonolob(us), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -eæ.]

Bot.: A tribe of Asclepiadaceæ.

gô-nô-l-ô-büs, s. [Gr. gônia=angle, and lobos=a pod. Named from the angular pods.]

Bot.: The typical genus of the tribe Gonolobææ. It consists of twining or shrubby plants, common in this country, with racemes, or corymbs of greenish or dingy purple flowers. About thirty species are known. The juice of Gonolobus macrophyllus is said to be used by the North American Indians to poison their arrows.

gôn-ô-phôre, gô-nôph-ô-rüm, s. [Gr. gonos=seed, and phoros=bearing.]

1. Bot.: A short stalk which bears the stamens and carpels in such plants as Anonads.

2. Zool.: The name given by Prof. Allman to the bud or sac containing the reproductive elements in the Corynida and other hydrozoa. It is used whether the buds become detached or not.

gô-nô-plâ-çi-ang, s. pl. [GONOPLAX.]

Zool.: The English name for the Gonoplacideæ (q. v.).

gô-nô-plâ-çi-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. Gonoplax, genit. gonoplac(is); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zoology: A family of brachyurous Crustaceans having the carapace either square or rhomboidal, and much broader than it is long. Milne Edwards places it between the Ocypodidae and the Grapsolidae.

gô-nô-plâx, s. [Gr. gonu=the knee, and plax=anything flat.]

Zool.: The typical genus of the family Gonoplacideæ (q. v.).

gô-nôp-tër-a, s. [Gr. gonu=the knee, or gônia=an angle, and ptera, pl. of pteron=a feather, a wing.]

Entom.: The typical genus of the family Gonopteridae (q. v.).

gô-nôp-tër-i-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. gonopter(a) (q. v.), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Entom.: A family of moths, group Noctuina. [GONOPTERA.]

gôn-ô-rhœ-â, s. [Lat., from Gr. gonorrhœia (Galen)=gonos=seed, and rhœô=to flow. The etymology does not name the disease accurately. (See def.)]

Pathol.: A specific disease, chiefly affecting the urethra, but sometimes also other mucous surfaces, accompanied by inflammation and muco-purulent bôil, bôÿ; pòut, jôw; cat, cell, chorus, chin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shün; -tion, -sion = zhün. -tious, -cious, -sious = shüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del.

discharge; in the chronic form it is termed gleet, the discharge then being thinner, sometimes lasting for months, or even years.

gō-nō-sō me, s. [Gr. gonos=offspring, seed, and sōma=the body.]

Zool.: The name applied by Prof. Allman to the reproductive zooids of a hydrozoon taken collectively.

gō-nō-thē-ca, s. [Gr. gonos=offspring, seed, and Lat. theca; Gr. thēkē=a box or chest.]

Zool.: The chitinous receptacle within which the gonophores of certain hydrozoa are produced. The same as GONANGIUM (q. v.).

gō-nys, s. [Gr. gonu=the knee.]

Ornith.: The keel or ridge of the lower mandible in the bill of a bird.

good, *god, *gode, *goud, *guod, *gud, *guid, *gude, a., adv., interj. & s. [A. S. gōd; cogn. with Dut. god; Icel. góðr; Dan. god; Goth. gods; Sw. god; Ger. gut; O. H. Ger. guot; O. Fris. and O. S. god.]

A. As adjective:

1. Having such physical qualities as are useful, proper, expected, or desired; not bad; not ill; worthy of praise.

"God saw everything that he had made, and behold it was very good."—Genesis i. 31.

2. Fit, proper, convenient, useful.

"A universe of death! which God by curse Created evil; for evil only good."

Milton: P. L., ii. 622.

3. Fit, adapted, useful; capable of being used or employed. (Followed by for.)

"All quality, that is good for anything, is originally founded upon merit."—Collier: On Envy.

4. Wholesome, proper, useful.

"The water of Nilus is sweeter than other waters in taste, and it is excellent good for the stone and hypochondriac melancholy."—Bacon: Nat. Hist., § 767.

5. Proper, right.

"In government it is good to use men of one rank equally."—Bacon: Essays; Of Followers and Friends.

6. Conducive to happiness.

"It is not good that man should be alone."—Genesis ii. 18.

4. A valuable possession or piece of property; worldly possessions, as wares, merchandise, commodities, chattels, effects, &c. (Almost always in the plural.)

"All thy goods are confiscate."

Shakesp.: Merchant of Venice, iv. 1.

*5. Goodness, good qualities, virtuous and charitable deeds.

"If all these petty ills shall change thy good."

Shakesp.: Rape of Lucrece, 655.

¶ (1) Crabb thus discriminates between good and goodness: "Good and goodness are abstract terms, drawn from the same word: the former to denote the thing that is good, the latter the inherent good property of a thing. The good we do is determined by the tendency of the action; but our goodness in doing it is determined by the motive of our actions."

(2) He thus discriminates between good, benefit, and advantage: "Good is an abstract universal term, which in its unlimited sense comprehends everything that can be conceived of, as suited in all its parts to the end proposed. In this sense benefit and advantage, as well as utility, service, profit, &c., are all modifications of good. Good is mostly employed for some positive and direct good; advantage for an adventitious and indirect good: the good is that which would be good to all; the advantage is that which is partially good, or good only in particular cases."

(3) He thus discriminates between goods, chattels, furniture, movables, and effects: "In the strict sense goods comprehends more than furniture, including not only that which is adapted for the domestic purposes of a family, but also everything which is of value to a person: the chairs and tables are a part of furniture; papers, books, and money, are included among the goods. The term chattels comprehends that species of goods which is in a special manner separated from one's person and house; a man's cattle, his implements of husbandry, the alienable rights which he has in land or buildings, are all comprehended under chattels: hence the propriety of the expression to seize a man's goods and chattels, as denoting the disposable property which he has about his person or at a distance. Movables comprehends all the other terms in the limited application to property, as far as it admits of being removed from one place to another. Effects is a term of nearly as extensive a signification as goods, but not so extensive an application: whatever a man has that is of any supposed value, or convertible into money, is entitled his goods; whatever a man has that can effect, produce, or bring forth money by sale, is entitled his effects." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

(4) For the difference between goods and commodity, see COMMODITY.

Botany:

1. The genus Chenopodium (q. v.).

2. Aspalathus chenopoda.

† The goosefoot tribe:

Bot.: The order Chenopodiaceæ.

goōse-grass, s. [Eng. goose, and grass; from the common idea that it is a favorite food or medicine for geese.]

Bot.: Galium aparine, a common plant. Its leaves, six or eight in a whorl, are hispid, their margins, midrib, and the angles of the stem very rough, with reflexed prickles, which, if dragged along the tongue, will bring blood. The flowers are white. Called also Cleavers or Clivers.

"Goosegrass, or wild tansy, is a weed that strong clays are very subject to."—Mortimer: Husbandry.

goōse-neck, s. [Eng. goose, and neck.]

1. Nautical:

(1) An iron fitted at the end of a yard or boom for various purposes.

"The goose-neck must be spread out by the armorer."—Marryat: Peter Simple, ch. vi.

(2) A davit.

2. Hydraul.: A nozzle having a universal joint connection to a fire-engine stand-pipe.

3. Agric.: A stick used in thatching.

goōse-pād-dle, v. t. [Eng. goose, and paddle.] To row in an awkward, irregular manner.

goōse-quill, s. [Eng. goose, and quill.] One of the quills or large wing-feathers of a goose; a pen made of such a feather.

goōs-ēr-ŷ, s. [Eng. goose; -ry.]

1. A place for keeping geese.

2. Silliness, stupidity like that of a goose.

"Who will soon look through and through The final goosery of your neat sermon actor."—Milton: Apology for Smectymus.

goōse-shāre, s. [Eng. goose, and share.]

goös-ey-gân-dër, s. [Eng. goose, and gander.]

1. A gander.

2. A silly fellow, a simpleton, a goose.

gö-phër (1), s. [Fr. gaufre=(1) a honey-comb, (2) a wafer, a kind of cake.]

Zoöl.: A name given by the early French settlers in this country to various animals which honey-comb the ground by burrowing in it. In Canada and in the state of Illinois it was given to a gray burrowing squirrel, Spermophilus Franklini, west of the Mississippi to S. Richardsoni, in Wisconsin to a striped squirrel, and in Missouri to a burrowing-pouched rat, Geomys bursarius. All these are mammals; but in Georgia the term was applied to a snake, Coluber couperi, and in Florida to a turtle, Testudo polyphemus. (Goodrich & Porter.)

gopher-hole, s.

I. Ord. Lang.: The burrow of a gopher. [GOPHER (1).]

II. Fort.: A small bomb-proof in a line of rifle-pits.

"Against [mortarshells] rifle-pits are no protection, and the soldiers burrow into the earth places known as gopher-holes."—Harper's Weekly, Aug. 6, 1864, p. 502.

gö-phër (2), s. [Heb. gopher, from the obsolete verb gaphar=to cover.] (For def. see etym. and compend.)

gopher-drift, s. An irregular drift made by gold and other prospectors when seeking the ore, without regard to regular grade.

gopher-wood, s.

1. Scrip.: The wood of which Noah's ark was directed to be made. Various attempts have been made to identify the tree. The most probable view is that it was the cypress; Lat. cupressus; Gr. kyparissos; the c, p, r of the Latin and k, p, r of the Greek being the Hebrew g, ph, r, differently pronounced. [CYPRESS.]

"Make thee an ark of gopher-wood."—Gen. vi. 14.

2. Bot.: Lawsonia alba.

gör-äl, s. [A Nepalese word.]

Zoöl.: Nemorhedus goral, an antelope found in the Himalaya mountains. It is about the size of the common goat, has black horns about four and a half inches long, the general color of the body mouse-gray.

gör-a-mý, gôur-a-mý, s. [A Javanese name.]

Ichthy.: Ophromemus olfax, a fish, a native of China, but has been introduced into the Mauritius, and into remote Cayenne. It is about the size of a turbot, possesses great tenacity of life even when out of the water, and is much valued for the table. The female is said to form a cavity in the sand for the reception of her eggs.

gor-bél-liéd, a. [Eng. gorbelly; -ed.] Fat, big-bellied.

"Nero did not take
A noble club-foot stripling; ne'er contract
With one throat-swollen, gorbelled, or crump-backed."
Holiday: Juvenal, sat. x.

gor-bél-ly, s. [A. S. gor=dirt, filth, and Eng. belly.]

1. A fat belly or paunch.

"With crump shoulders, side, and gorbellies."—P. Hol-land: Camden, p. 53.

gor-cock, s. [Etym. of first element doubtful, but perhaps A. S. gor=dirt; Eng. cock.] The moor-cock, red-grouse, or red-game.

"Mongst desert hills, where, leagues around, Dwelt but the gorcock and the deer."
Scott: Bridal of Triermain, iii. 6.

gor-crôw, gore-crow, s. [A. S. gor=dirt, filth, and Eng. crow.] The carrion-crow.

"It will also eat grain and insects, and like the raven will pick out the eyes of young lambs when just dropped, for which reason it was formerly distinguished from the rook, which feeds entirely on grain and insects, by the name of the gor or gorcrow."—Pennant: British Zoology; Carrion Crow.

gor-di-ä-çš-a, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. gordi(us), and Lat. neut. pl. adj. suff. -acea.]

bél, bôy; pôut, jôwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph=f. -cian, -tian = shân. -tion, -sion = shûn; -tion, -sion = zhûn. -tious, -cious, -sious = shûs. -ple, -dle, &c. = bël, dël

Zoöl.: Hair-worms: an order of Scolecida, consisting of vermiform or thread-like animals with distinct sexes, having their alimentary canal, if present at all, imperfectly developed, and their water-vascular system rudimentary or absent. During a portion of their existence they live in the interior of insects.

gor-di-an, a. [Named after Gordius, a half mythic king of Phrygia, father of Midas.] Of or pertaining to Gordius, or the knot tied by him; hence, intricate, complicated.

"She was a gordian shape of dazzling hue."

Keats: Lamia, l.

gordian-knot, s. A knot tied by Gordius in the rope which bound the yoke of his chariot to the draught-tree in such an artful manner that the ends of the cord could not be perceived. So intricate was it that the report went abroad that the empire of Asia was promised by the oracle to him who could untie it. Alexander the Great, wishing to inspire his soldiers with courage and his enemies with the belief that he was born to conquer Asia, cut the knot with his sword, and so claimed to have fulfilled the oracle. Hence, the term gordian-knot is used for any apparently inextricable difficulty or deadlock; and to cut the gordian-knot is equivalent to removing or solving a difficulty by bold or unusual measures.

"Whatsoever it was, I must be fain to leave it as a Gordian-knot, which no writer helps me to untie."—Baker: King Stephen (an. 1154).

gor-di-an, v. t. [GORDIAN, a.] To knot or tie up.

"Looks . . . simply gordianed up and braided."

Keats: Endymion, bk. i.

gor-di-üs (pl. gor-di-i), s. [GORDIAN.]

Zoöl.: The typical genus of the order Gordiaceæ (q. v.). It consists of those extraordinarily thin and long inhabitants of the water, popularly believed, at least till recently, to be animated horse-hairs, and producible by the simple process of putting horse-hairs into a pond, ditch, or country well. After a time they bore their way into the bodies of insects. When mature they quit their insect residence and, returning to the liquid element, deposit their eggs in long chains. When gordii are dried they become hard and brittle, and apparently dead, but water returns them to their wonted suppleness and vitality. Gordius aquaticus is the Common Hair-worm.

göre (1), s. [A. S. gor=filth, dirt; cogn. with Icel. gor=gore, the cud in animals; Sw. gorr=dirt, matter; cf. Gr. chordê=a gut, a cord; Lat. hira=gut; Icel. garnir, görn=guts.]

"And now, their mightiest quelled, the battle swerved, With many an inrode gored."—Milton: P. L., vi. 387.

2. To cut in a triangular shape; to pierce with a gore.

gor-fly, s. [A. S. gor=dung; Eng. fly.] A species of fly.

gorçe, s. [Fr., from Low Lat. gorgia=the throat, a narrow pass; Lat. gorge=an abyss, the throat; Ital. gorga, gorgia.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The throat, the gullet.

"He with him closed, and, laying mighty hold Upon his throat did gripe his gorge so fast,
That wanting breath him down to ground he cast."

Spenser: F. Q., VI. iv. 22.

2. That which is swallowed or gorged; swallowed food caused to rise by nausea or disgust.

"And all the way, most like a brutish beast,
He spewed vp his gorge, that all did him detest."

Spenser: F. Q., I. iv. 21.

3. The act of gorging; a heavy meal.

"The counselor heareth causes with lesse pain being empty, then he shall be able after a ful gorge."—Wilson: Arte of Rhetorique, p. 112.

4. A narrow passage or entrance; a pass between hills.

"I headed not the eddyng surge;
Mine eye but saw the Trossach's gorge."

Scott: Lady of the Lake, vi. 19.

5. Disgust. (Shakesp.: Hamlet, v. 1.)

*6. Indignation, temper.

"My gorge began to rise. 'Yes,' said I, sulkily, 'my family does live at Richmond.'"—Washington Irving: Ralph Rivington.

2. Fort.: A line joining the inner extremities of a work; as—

(1) A line drawn between the rear ends of the faces of a redan.

(2) A line across the narrow portion of a bastion, from the points of junction of its flanks with the curtains.

3. Mason.: A small groove at the underside of a coping, to keep the drip from reaching the wall; a throat.

4. Naut.: The groove or score of a pulley.

gorge-hook, s. Two fish-hooks separated by a piece of lead.

gorçe, v. t. & i. [Fr. gorger.] [GORGE, s.]

A. Transitive:

1. To swallow greedily or in large mouthfuls.

"Dislodging from a region scarce of prey,
To gorge the flesh of lambs or yearling kids."

Milton: P. L., iii. 434.

2. To fill up to the throat, to glut, to satiate.

"The full-fed hound or gorged hawk,
Unapt for tender smell or speedy flight,
Make slow pursuit or altogether balk."

Shakesp.: Rape of Lucrece, 694.

3. To fill to overflowing, to glut.

"A house in England which has been gorged with undeserved riches."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xxiii.

B. Intrans.: To feed greedily, to stuff one's self.

"When the Bushmen of South Africa have enough food, they gorge and sleep."—Lindsay: Mind in the Lower Animals, i. 41.

gorged, a. [Eng. gorge, s.; -ed.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Having a gorge, or throat; throated.

2. Her.: Encircled round the throat, as when an animal is represented bearing a crown or the like round the neck. It is blazoned as gorged with a crown, &c.

gor-gē-ōus, a. [O. Fr. gorgias, gorgias=gorgeous, from gorgias=a gorget, from gorge=the throat.] Splendid, magnificent, showy, glittering with splendid colors, resplendent, sumptuously adorned, or gay.

"The heralds and pursuivants were waiting in their gorgeous tabards."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. 1.

gor-gē-ōus-ly, adv. [English gorgeous; -ly.] In a gorgeous manner, splendidly, magnificently: with showy magnificence.

"Golden and red above it
The clouds float gorgeously."
Longfellow: The Castle by the Sea.

gor-gēt, s. [Fr. gorgette, from gorge=the throat.]

1. Arm.: A metal covering for the throat, worn by an armed man, to protect the juncture between the helmet and the breast-plate; also a kind of breast-plate like a half-moon. The camail (q. v.), or throat covering of chain-mail, is sometimes called the gorget of mail.

"See how his gorget peers above his gown
To tell the people in what danger he was."
Ben Jonson: Catiline, iv. 2.

*2. Dress: A kind of ruff formerly worn by females.

*3. Mil.: A small, crescent-shaped, metallic ornament worn on the breast by officers on duty. The gorget was the last remnant of body armor worn by infantry in England.

4. Surgery:

(1) A lithotomic cutting-instrument.

(2) A canulated or concave conductor used in operation for fistula; called also a blunt gorget.

Gor-gōn, s. & a. [Latin Gorgon, Gorgo, from Gr. Gorgō=the Gorgon, from gorgos=fearful, terrible.]

A. As substantive:

1. Lit. & Gr. Mythol.: One of three female monsters of terrible aspect. They were the daughters of Phorcys and Ceto, and were named Euryale, Stheno, and Medusa, the two first being immortal. Their hair was entwined with serpents, their hands were of brass, their bodies covered with impenetrable scales, their teeth resembling the tusks of a wild boar, and their eyes possessing the power of turning all on whom they fixed them to stone. By the aid of Minerva they were finally conquered by Perseus, and the drops of blood which fell to the ground from Medusa's head were changed into serpents, which have ever since infested the sandy deserts of Libya. The head was placed on theegis of Minerva, and retained its power of turning the beholder into stone.

"But brave Acontes, Persens' friend, by chance Looked back, and met the Gorgon's fatal glance."
Meynweiring: Ovid: Metamorphoses iv.

2. Fig.: Anything very ugly or horrid; a woman of repulsive manners or appearance.

gor-gō-nl-ical, a. [Eng. gorgon; -ical.] The same as GORGONEAN (q. v.).

gor-gō-nl-ds, s. pl. [Lat. gorgonia, and fem. pl. adj. suff. -idae.]

1. Zool.: Sea-shrubs; a family of Actinozoa, order Alcyonaria (Asteroid polypes). The comarac, which is arborescent, is permanently rooted, and has a grooved or furrowed branching sclerobasis with dermosclerites—i. e., tissue secretions. The species occur mostly in shallow water in the warmer seas, attaining their maximum in the tropics. Besides Gorgonia, the family contains the genus Corallium, of which the type is Corallium rubrum, the red coral of commerce.

2. Palaeont.: The Gorgonidae have existed at least from Eocene and perhaps from Oolitic times.

gor-gō-nl-ize, v. t. [Eng. gorgon; -ize.] To petrify as though by the glance of a Gorgon; to turn to stone.

"Whose eyes so gorgonzated that can endure
To see the all-upholder forced to bow."
Davies: Holy Rood, p. 15.

Gor-gōn-zō-la, s. A celebrated cheese made in Italy and named after the town.

gor-hēn, s. [GORCOCK.] The female of the gorkock.

gor-il-la, s. [The name was found current in parts of Western Africa, when, in the fifth century B. C., the Carthaginian navigator Hanno visited it on his exploratory and colonizing expedition. It was applied, however, not to an ape, but to a negro tribe, members of which he invited to Carthage, but they could not be prevailed upon to accompany him.]

Zool.: A celebrated anthropoid ape (Troglodytes gorilla), generally believed to come nearer than any known one to man, though some contend that the affinity of the gibbon is closer. [GIBBON.] The number of teeth in the gorilla, and all the old world monkeys, except the lemurs, is thirty-two, the same as in man. The hand has the same bones as in man. Professor Huxley considers Cuvier's order Quadrumana (four-handed) inaccurate, maintaining that the hinder extremities of all the monkeys and lemurs are framed anatomically as feet and not hands. The height is about five feet, almost the same as man. On the other hand, the greatest capacity of the gorilla's brain is only 34½ cubic inches, the least 23, against 62 in the least capacious human skull, and 114 in the greatest. The formidable canines, so conspicuous in the specimens in the Natural History Department of the British Museum at South Kensington, look very brutal, but they are only sexual characteristics, being of more moderate size in the female. The low facial angle also, and the abundant hair, with the extraordinary breadth of the chest, diminish the resemblance. The last-mentioned characteristic imparts to the animal colossal strength, which it is said to use in its native haunts against man. It is a native of Lower Guinea and the interior of equinoctial Africa. It has a congener in the same region, Troglodytes niger, the Chimpanzee (q. v.).

gory-dew, s.

Bot.: Palmella cruenta, an algal of simple organization, common on damp walls in shady places. It appears at first in the form of rosy gelatinous patches, ultimately becoming confluent over a wide expanse, presenting the appearance of coagulated venous blood, whence its English name. (Griffith & Henfrey, &c.)

gōs-bā, s. [Arab.]

Mus.: An Arabian flute. There are two sorts of the gosba, the one with three holes in the lower extremity, producing four sounds which, with their harmonics at the fifth, complete the octave. The instrument is employed to guide the voice of a singer. The other gosba is larger and pierced with six holes, with a double hole at the back. (Stainer & Barrett.)

gos-hāwk, gos-hauk, s. [Properly goosehawk; from A. S. gōshafuc, from gōs=a goose, and hafuc=a hawk; Icel. gás-haukr.]

Ornith.: Asur palumbarius, a bird of prey. It is brown above, white underneath, barred across with brown, with five browner bands on the tail; the eyelids whitish. When immature it has dots instead gōs-pēl, gods-pel, godds-pel, gods-pelle, gods-pelle, s. & a. [A. S. godspell, from god=God, and spell=a story, a history; Icel. gudspjall=God-story; O. H. Ger. gotspel. It is not from A. S. gōd=good, and spell, though this derivation would exactly agree with the Gr. euangelion=good message, from eu=well, and angelos=a messenger.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) In the same sense as II. 1.

(2) In the same sense as II. 2.

2. Figuratively:

(1) Anything which announces good news, political, social, personal, or of any other character.
(2) Anything accepted as infallibly true; as, You must not take the words just for gospel.
(3) Anything constituting a powerful principle of action.

II. Technically:

1. Script. & Theol.: A term signifying good news, founded originally on certain words used by the angel in the annunciation of the Savior's birth: "Behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy" (Luke ii. 10). It is generally held to signify salvation through the atoning death of Christ.

"Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature."—Matthew xvi. 15.

2. Script. Canon, &c.: The four canonical records of our Savior's life, by St. Matthew, St. Mark, St. Luke, and St. John. This signification of the word is derived from the first one. It is the historical narrative of that first advent of Christ, the announcement of which was disclosed by the angel to be good tidings [ii. 1]. The titles are not worded the Gospel by Matthew, by Mark &c.; it is the Gospel according to Matthew, according to Mark, &c. This implies that the gospel is that of God (Rom. xv. 16; 1 Thess. ii. 2, &c.) or of Christ (Mark i. 1; Rom. i. 16, &c.), as related by Matthew, by Mark, &c. In one place, however, St. Paul says "my gospel" (1 Tim. ii. 8). In the New Testament the word gospel, Gr. euangelion, is used only of communications made orally. The earliest known use of the term for written accounts of the Savior's life, is in Justin Martyr's first "Apology," about A. D. 150. He speaks of "Memories of the Apostles, called Gospels." Irenæus, Bishop of Lyons from 177 to 202, used the word gospel for the four evangelical narratives taken collectively [CANON]; but he also employs it of each of them taken separately and speaks of their "fourfoldness." He places them in the order which now obtains, as do Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Eusebius, and the early church generally. Some investigators, however, think that Mark's gospel comes first in time; that the next was perhaps Matthew, that Luke was the third, and John certainly the last. The first three are called synoptics, because they all look at the events which they describe from the same point of view; while the standpoint of John is quite different. [SYNOPTIC.] Though the Gospels stand in the New Testament before the Epistles, some of the latter undoubtedly preceded them in point of time. [JOHN, LUKE, MARK, MATTHEW.]

3. Liturgy: The part of the gospels prescribed in the Prayer-book to be read on any particular day in the Communion service.

B. As adj.: Of or belonging to the gospel in any of the senses of enumerated under A.

* Obvious compounds: Gospel-offer, gospel-sermon, gospel-preacher, &c.

gōs-sýp, -ý-üm, s. [Latin gossypion, gossipion, gossypinus. (Pliny.)]

Bot.: A genus of Malvaceæ, tribe Hibiscæ. The leaves are generally three or five-lobed; around the flower is an involucre, cordate at the base, and terminating at the apex in three broad, deeply-cut segments. Calyx five-toothed, corolla of five petals, stamens united into a column, fruit a three or five-celled capsule, each cell when ripe bursting through the middle and exhibiting the seeds enveloped in cotton. The species cultivated in the United States, which furnishes so much cotton, is Gossypium barbadense, of which there are two well-marked varieties, the Sea-island or Long-staple cotton, and the Upland, Georgian, Bowed, or Short-staple cotton; that of India is G. herbaceum. How many more species exist has not been determined, the genus being very variable. A bland oil is made from the seeds, which also, after having been pressed, have been used as a food for cattle. Martius states that bōil, bōy; pōūt, jōwī; cat, cēll, chorus, chīn, bench; go, gēm; thin, thīs; -cian, -tian = shān. -tion, -sion = shūn; -tīon, -sion = zhūn. -tious, -cious, -sious = shūs. -ble, -die, &c. = bēl, dēl.

—Prompt. Parv.

2. A slough, a miry place.

Göth, s. [Lat. Gothi=the Goths.]

1. Lit.: One of an ancient race belonging to the Teutones, who originally occupied a great portion of European and Asiatic Russia. Filmer, their king, conducted a body of his nation to the coast of the Euxine, where it afterward increased into a numerous and formidable people under the names of Visigoths and Ostrogoths, the former occupying the countries to the west of the Dnieper, the latter those to the east. The Visigoths crossed the Danube, plundered Rome and Italy, and fixed their residence in Spain, while their kindred, the Ostrogoths, took possession of Italy, which they held till A. D. 544, when they were overthrown by Narses, general of Justinian. From this time the Goths as a nation make no figure in history, except in Spain; but traces of their language, manners, and arts are still to be found in every country of the East. A branch of the Visigoths, settled in Moesia, the modern Bulgaria, are known as Mesogoths, and the translation of a great portion of the Bible by Wulfila, or Ulfila, a Christian bishop, about A. D. 350, fragments only of which have come down to us, is the earliest known specimen of the Gothic or Teutonic tribe of tongues.

A. As adjective:

1. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: Of or pertaining to the Goths; as, Gothic customs, &c.

"Confining his labors almost wholly to religious and legendary histories, he [Albert Durer] turned the Testament into the history of a Flemish village; the habits of Herod, Pilate, Joseph, &c., their dwellings, their utensils, and their customs were all Gothic and European."—Walpole: Catalogue of Engravers, vol. v.

2. Fig.: Rude, uncivilized, barbarous.

"The Gothic cloud
Of time and language o'er thy genius thrown."

Thomson: Summer, 1, 578.

II. Arch.: A term sometimes used to distinguish mediæval from classical architecture. In a more limited sense it comprehends those styles only of mediæval architecture which are characterized by the pointed arch. In the narrower sense, Gothic architecture dates from the middle of the twelfth century; in the wider, it includes as well Anglo-Saxon, which prevailed from the close of the sixth to the middle of the eleventh century, and also Anglo-Norman, which flourished during the succeeding hundred years. The latter was followed by the Semi-Norman or Transition; this gave place, at the beginning of the thirteenth century, to Early English, and this, at the commencement of the fourteenth century, to Decorated English, replaced at the beginning of the fifteenth century by the Perpendicular. Gothic architecture attained its perfection in the Decorated English period. The free, flowing lines and the chaste ornamentation by which it is distinguished were degenerated into the stiff, staring lines and the too-elaborate decoration of the Perpendicular; and the process of debasement continued until, in the early part of the seventeenth century, Gothic fell into entire disuse. Toward the close of the eighteenth century a reaction began, and the movement has gone on gathering strength ever since. [DECORATED, EARLY ENGLISH, PERPENDICULAR, POINTED.]

B. As substantive:

1. Ord. Lang.: The language of the Goths. It belongs to the Low German group of the Teutonic dialects, to which belong English, Frisian, Dutch, Flemish, and Old Saxon. It is the oldest and most primitive of the Teutonic dialects of which any remains are known; it was spoken by the eastern and western Goths, who occupied the province of Dacia. It is closely akin to English and Dutch.

II. Technically:

1. Arch.: The Gothic style of architecture. [A. II.]

"The parish church of Lambeth is at a small distance from the Palace, has a plain tower, and the architecture is of the Gothic of the time of Edward IV."—Pennant; Lambeth Church.

2. A shaped incising-tool used for cutting out forms or blanks for gloves, envelopes, or other objects cut to a shape from fabric, leather, or paper.

3. Woodworking: A chisel with a curved blade adapted to make a rounded groove in cutting or turning wood. They are known as flat, middle, and quick; their curves being respectively obtuse, medium, and acute. The gouge existed in early ages in stone, bone, and bronze.

gouge-bit, s. A wood-boring tool used in a brace. It has a rounded end, and a groove which contains the chips.

gouge-slip, s. An oil-stone or hone slip, for sharpening on the concave side of the edge of the gouge.

gouge, v. t. [GOUGE, s. Fr. gouger.]

1. Lit.: To scoop out or make a groove in with a gouge.

"Gouging of hem out

Just to the size of my bottles, and not slicing."

Ben Jonson: The Devil is an Ass, ii. 1.

II. Figuratively:

1. To force out the eye of with the thumb or finger.

2. To cheat; to impose upon. (Amer.)

goul, s. [GHOUL.]

goul, goule, goul-en, gowle, v. i. [Icel. gaula.] To howl, to yowl, to cry aloud, to shout.

"Some of man, cry thou and goul."—Wycliffe: Ezekiel xxi. 12.

göul'-and, s. [A. S. geolo=yellow.] A flower; perhaps the gowan or mountain daisy.

Gou-lard, s. [Named after Thomas Goulard, a surgeon at Montpellier, about A. D. 1750, who discovered it.]

Pharm.: The same as GOULARD'S-EXTRACT (q. v.).

goulard's-extract, s.

Pharm.: A saturated solution of basic lead acetate. It is used as a lotion in cases of inflammation.

goule s. [O. Fr. goule; Fr. gueule; Latin gula.] The throat.

gour, s. [GAUR.]

gôu-ra, s. [The name in some of the Eastern islands.]

Ornith.: Ground pigeon; the typical genus of the family Gouridae. Goura coronata is the size of a turkey. It is wild in the Eastern Archipelago, and is domesticated in Java.

gôur-a-mi, s. [GORAMY.]

gôurd (1), goord, gourde, gowrde, s. [O. F. gouhourde, côharrde, côngourde, choourde; Fr. gourde, from Lat. cucurbita=a gourd; prob. connected with corbis=a basket.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. In the same sense as II.

"The gourd and olive brown Weave the light roof." Dyer: Ruins of Rome.

2. A bottle or vessel for carrying water, so called from its shape.

"I have heer in a gourd
A draught of wyn." Chaucer: C. T., 17, 014.

II. Technically:

1. Botany: Cucurbita pepo; a hispid plant, with tendrils, large yellow flowers, and oblong or ovate fruit; a native of Astrachan, but cultivated in many countries. It has run into many varieties. The fruit is used as a culinary vegetable in soups and stews, or mixed after being sugared and spiced, with sliced apples, to constitute pumpkin pie. Called also the Pumpkin-gourd or Pompon.

2. Scripture: Hebrew qiqayon; Septuagint kolokynthê. The Hebrew word is apparently so much akin to the Greek word kiki, used by Dioscorides for the Castor-oil plant (Ricinus communis), that the "gourd" of Scripture was probably that species. It is a euphorbiaceous plant, and not of the order Cucurbitaceæ. For the wild gourd of Scripture, see ¶ (2).

¶ (1) Of the genuine Cucurbitaceæ, the Bitter or Colocynth Gourd is Citrullus colocynthis; the Bottle, Club, or Trumpet Gourd is Lagenaria vulgaris, which so varies in the form of its fruit as to suggest in the several individuals all these appellations. The Gooseberry gourd is Momordica echinata; the Orange gourd is Cucurbita aurantia; Red gourd and Spanish gourd are popular names for Cucurbita maxima, the flesh of which, when boiled, is like a tender carrot; the Snake gourd is the genus Trichosanthes, and especially T. colubrina; the Squash gourd is Cucurbita melopepo; and the White gourd is Bennicosa cerifera. It is extensively used by the natives of India in their curries.

(2) The Wild Gourd of Scripture: Hebrew pl. paquo and peqaim. It is from paqa=to be split or burst. It is a plant which grew on a wild vine—i. e., was procumbent, and had tendrils. It moreover produced "death in the pot"; discoverable in a moment by the taste. It was probably either the Colocynth (Citrullus colocynthis), or the Squirting Cucumber (Momordica elaterium), the one called by Gesenius by its ancient name, Cucumis agrestis.

(3) In Lindley's Natural System of Botany, the order Cucurbitaceæ is called the Gourd tribe, altered in his Vegetable Kingdom to Cucurbits.

gourd-shell, s. The shell or rind of the gourd, which is used for drinking-cups, &c.

"It [the catalogue of household utensils] consists of gourd-shells, which they convert into vessels that serve as bottles to hold water, and as baskets to contain their victuals and other things, with covers of the same; and of a few wooden bowls and trenchers of different sizes."—Cook: Voyages, vol. vi., bk. iii., ch. 9.

gourd-tree, s.

Bot.: Crescentia cujete, more frequently called in English the Calabash tree (q. v.). See also Crescentia.

gourd-worm, s.

Zool.: The same as FLUKE-WORM (q. v.). It infests the liver of the sheep.

gôurd (2), gord, s. [O. Fr. gourt.] A kind of false dice, probably so called from being hollowed out.

"To eke out your living . . .

By fulham and gourd."

Scott: Fortunes of Nigel, ch. xxvii.

gout (1), *goute, *gowte, s. [Fr. goutte, from Lat. gutta=a drop.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A drop.

"I see thee still,
And on the blade o' th' dudgeon gout's of blood."
Shakespeare: Macbeth, ii. 1.

2. In the same sense as II.

"The goute lette hir nothing for to daunce."

Chaucer: C. T., 16,326.

II. Pathol.: A disease produced by the excess of uric acid in the blood in the form of urate of soda. It is usually hereditary, is rare before the age of thirty, and generally arises from excessive indulgence in wines or malt liquors, the last giving rise to "poor man's gout." It is rarely produced by the use of spirits. The great toe is the part most frequently affected, pain and irritability are the leading symptoms; it may become chronic, and is very intractable to treatment. When it attacks internal parts it is termed irregular or retrocedent gout, and is proportionately more dangerous. Diet requires strict regulation, with abstinence or restriction from alcoholic liquors. Excessive exertion and fatigue, or mental labor, have been known to produce gout also, but whenever it is, as it usually is, hereditary, extreme precautions ought to be taken to prevent the occurrence or recurrence of an attack.

gout-stones, s. pl.

Pathol.: The same as CHALE-STONES (q. v.).

"She's desperate to govern her."—Shakespeare: Lear, v. 3.

II. Gram.: To cause to be in a particular case; as, A verb transitive governs the noun in the accusative case; to require a particular case to follow; as, A verb governs the accusative case.

B. Intransitive:

*1. To exercise authority, to administer the law; to be or act as governor or ruler.

"While the chief magistrate governs according to the law he ought to be obeyed."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xi.

*2. To maintain the superiority; to have the control, to prevail.

"The heart of brothers governs in our loves."

Shakespeare: Antony and Cleopatra, ii. 2.

† Crabb thus discriminates between to govern, to rule, and to regulate: "The exercise of authority enters more or less into the signification of these terms; but to govern implies the exercise likewise of judgment and knowledge. To rule implies rather the unqualified exercise of power, the making the will the rule; a king governs his people by means of wise laws and an upright administration; a despot rules over a nation according to his arbitrary decision. These terms are applied either to persons or things: persons govern or rule others; or they govern, rule, or regulate things. In regard to persons, govern is always in a good sense, but rule is sometimes taken in a bad sense; it is naturally associated with an abuse of power: to govern is so perfectly discretionary, that we speak of governing ourselves; but we speak only of ruling others. To govern necessarily supposes the adoption of judicious means; but ruling is confined to no means but such as will obtain the end of subjecting the will of one to that of another. Regulate is a species of governing simply by judgment; the word is applicable to things of minor moment, where the force of authority is not so requisite: one governs the affairs of a nation, or a large body where great interests are involved; we regulate the concerns of an individual, or we regulate in cases where good order or convenience only is consulted: so likewise in regard to ourselves, we govern our passions, but we regulate our affections." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

*gov-êrn, s. [O. Fr. gouverno; Fr. gouverne; Port. & Ital. governo; Sp. gobierno.] Government.

gōv-ēr-n-lēss*, a. [Eng. govern; -less.] Without a governor or government.

gōv-ēr-n-ment, s. & a. [Fr. gouvernement, from gouverner=to govern; Ital. governo.to.]

A. As substantive:

1. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of governing; control, direction, regulation, or administration of public or private affairs.

"The kingly government of this your land."

Shakesp.: Richard III., iii. 7.

2. Guidance, regulation, direction; as, Precepts serve for the government of the conduct.

3. Self-control, evenness of temper.

"Defect of manners, want of government."

4. Control; restraint; regulation; moderation.

*5. Manageableness; docility; obedience.

"Each part deprived of supple government, Shall stiff and stark and cold appear, like death."

Shakesp.: Romeo and Juliet, iv. 1.

*6. The power of controlling or regulating.

"Quite beyond the government of patience."

Shakesp.: Cymbeline, ii. 4.

7. The form of policy in a state; the mode or system according to which the legislative, executive, and judicial powers are vested and exercised; a system of laws and customs; a constitution (q. v.). There are numerous forms of government, as aristocracy, democracy, despotism, monarchy, oligarchy, republicanism, &c. (See these words.)

"That ancient constitution and government which is our only security for law and liberty."—Burke: On the French Revolution.

8. The right or power of governing, or of exerting supreme power.

"I here resign my government to thee."

Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. III., iv. 6.

9. An empire, kingdom, or other state; a body politic under one authority; a territory, province, or district under a governor.

10. The council or body of persons intrusted with the administration of the laws; the management of home and foreign affairs, and generally the public business of a state; the administration; the ministry; the executive power.

1. Government of the United States:

The executive power is vested in the President, who holds office for four years and receives annually $50,000.

The Vice-President, as President of the Senate, discharges the duties of that office, except in case of the removal or death of the President, in which event he assumes the executive powers. He is elected for the same term of office as the President, and receives $8,000 annually.

The President and Vice-President are elected by electors chosen by the people. The number of electors from each State is equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled.

The electors vote by ballot. These votes are sent sealed to the President of the Senate, who opens them in the presence of Congress. If there are two parties who have received an equal number of votes, the House of Representatives choose by ballot one of them for President, provided a possible third candidate has not received a majority of the votes, in which case he is entitled to the office.

The various Cabinet officers are appointed by the President. They are eight in number, and receive $8,000 each annually. The Cabinet is arranged in the following order of succession named in the Presidential Succession Act of January 19, 1886, which provides for a successor for the President and Vice-President should they both die during their term of office:

1. Secretary of State.
2. Secretary of the Treasury.
3. Secretary of War.
4. Attorney-General.
5. Postmaster-General.
6. Secretary of the Navy.
7. Secretary of the Interior.
8. Secretary of Agriculture.

The legislative power is vested in Congress, of which there are two branches; the Senate, which is composed of two members from each State, who hold office for six years, at an annual salary of $5,000; and the House of Representatives, who are elected by a majority of votes cast in the various congressional districts of each State, to hold office two years, and receive $5,000 annually.

The President of the United States is commander-in-chief of the army and navy; but the direct supervision of them belongs to the Secretaries of War and of the Navy.

The judiciary of the United States consists of a Supreme Court, which sits at Washington, and which is composed of a Chief Justice, who receives $10,500 annually, and eight Associate Justices, who receive $10,000 annually. They are appointed by the President, and hold office during good behavior.

The United States is divided into nine judicial circuits, each of which has a circuit judge, who is paid $8,000 a year.

There are also fifty-eight district courts, from which an appeal lies to the circuit court.

Each State and Territory has its own local government, not unlike the general government in its essential features. The executive authority is vested in the Governor, whose term of office and salary vary in different States.

The revenue of the government is chiefly derived from customs duties, proceeds of sales of public lands, and internal revenue taxes upon distilled spirits, fermented liquors, tobacco, &c.

In conformity with several acts of Congress, the surplus revenue is devoted to the gradual redemption of the public debt.

II. Gram.: The influence of one word in determining the case of a second; especially of nouns, verbs, and prepositions; the influence of a word in regard to construction.

B. As adj.: Of or pertaining to a government; employed in, by, or for a government; as, a government office, a government official.

¶ (1) Crabb thus discriminates between government and administration: "Both these terms may be employed either to designate the act of governing and administering, or the persons governing and administering. In both cases government has a more extensive meaning than administration: the government includes every exercise of authority; the administration implies only that exercise of authority which consists in putting the laws or will of another in force; hence, when we speak of the government, as it respects the persons, it implies the whole body of constituted authorities; and the administration, only that part which puts in execution the intentions of the whole."

(2) He thus discriminates between government and constitution: "Government implies generally the act of governing or exercising authority under any form whatever; constitution implies any constituted or fixed form of government: we may have a government without a constitution; we cannot have a constitution without a government." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) gōv-ēr-n-ment-ā-l, a. [Eng. government; -al.] Of or pertaining to a government.

"Members . . . favorable to the governmental policy."—London Times.

gōv-ēr-n-ōr, gov-ern-our*, s. [Fr. gouverneur; Sp. gobernador; Port. governador; Ital. governatore, from Lat. gubernator, from gubernō=to steer.]

1. Ordinary Language:

*1. A steersman; a pilot.

2. One who is invested with supreme power or authority to administer or enforce the laws in a state.

3. One who rules with delegated power.

4. One who has the supreme direction or regulation.

5. Anything which has the power or quality of ruling, directing, or regulating.

"The Deity, or that perfect mind which is the supreme governor of all things."—Cudworth: Intellectual System, p. 110.

6. A tutor; a guardian; one who has charge of the education of a young man.

"The heir . . . under tutors and governors until the time appointed of the father."—Galatians iv. 1, 2.

7. A person, or one of a number of persons, to whom are intrusted the direction and management of a business, an institution, &c.

8. An elderly person; a father. (Slang.)

II. Technically:

1. Gas: A device which regulates the passage of gas from the holder to the mains, admitting it thereto in quantities determined by the rate at which it is used. The pressure in the mains determines the area of the opening through which the gas enters. [GAS-GOVERNOR.]

2. Steam-eng.: A device which regulates the admission of steam to the engine according to the rate of motion. The intention is to maintain uniform velocity, and any acceleration of speed above a given rate causes a valve to be partially closed, diminishing the area of steam passage; contrariwise in case of flagging in the speed of motion of the engine. The favorite form of governor has a pair of balls suspended from a vertical shaft, so as to swing outward when the shaft is rotated. The greater the speed the greater the centrifugal force, and consequently the farther the balls depart from the axis of rotation; the inclination of the ball arms is made effective in working the valve.

governor cut-off, s.

Steam-eng.: An automatic arrangement in which the acceleration or retardation of the motion of the governor, due to changes of speed of the engine, is made to cut off the steam at an earlier or later period of the stroke of the piston, so that with the increased boiler-pressure or lighter work the steam shall be cut off earlier in the stroke, and when greater work is imposed on the engine, or the steam-pressure flags, the steam-cylinder shall receive steam from the boiler during a larger proportion of the stroke of the piston.

governor-general, s. A governor who has under him subordinate or deputy governors; a viceroy; as, the governor-general of India.

governor-valve, s.

Steam-eng.: A valve in a steam-pipe operated by the governor to vary the area of steam opening according to the rate of moving, and consequently the requirement of the engine; the object being to maintain a uniform rate.

Governor-valve gear:

Steam-eng.: An arrangement of parts whereby the position of the governor balls, resulting from their rate of motion, is made to act upon the induction valve of an engine.

gōv-ēr-n-ōr-ship, s. [English governor; -ship.] The position or office of a governor.

gōw, s. [GULL.]

1. A gull.

2. A fool; a stupid fellow.

"Gow, a name for a fool. What a difference there is between John Gerrard the gow, and George Wishart the sage."—Gall: Encycl., p. 224.

gōw-ān, s. [Gael. & Ir. gugan=a bud, a flower.] A daisy; a perennial plant or flower.

"And now he's had his bit sleep out, and is as fresh as a May gowan, to answer what your honor likes to speir."—Scott: Guy Mannering, ch. xxxiii.

¶ (1) Ewe-gowan:

Bot.: The common daisy; apparently denominated from the ewe, as being frequently in pastures, and fed on by sheep.

"Some bit wae'fu' love story, enough to mak the pink an' the ewe-gowans blush to the very lip."—Brownie of Bodsbeck, i. 215.

(2) Horse-gowan:

Botany: This name includes the Leontodon, the Hypochoeris, and the Crepis.

(3) Large white-gowan:

Bot.: The ox-eye.

"Some of the prevailing weeds in meadows and grass lands are ox-eye, or large white-gowan, chrysanthemum, leucanthemum, &c."—Wilson: Renfrewshire, p. 136.

(4) Lucken-gowan:

Bot.: The Globe-flower.

(5) Witch-gowan: (See extract.)

"Witch-gowan flowers are large yellow gowans, with a stalk filled with pernicious sap, resembling milk, which when anointed on the eyes is believed to cause instant blindness. This pernicious juice is called by the peasantry witches' milk."—Remains Nithsdale Song, p. 110.

gōw-ān-ēd, a. [Eng. gowan; -ed.] Covered with the mountain daisy.

"On yon gowaned lawn she was seen."

Tarras: Poems, p. 80.

gōw-ān-ŷ, gōw-ān-lē, a. [Eng. gowan; -y.]

1. Abounding with mountain daisies.

2. Having a fair and promising appearance; as, a gowanie day, a day which has a flattering appearance, but attended with such circumstances as are commonly understood to indicate an approaching storm.

gown's-man, gown-man, s. [GOWNSMAN.]

gown, v. t. & i. [GOWN, s.]

A. Trans.: To put a gown on; to dress in a gown. (Used only in the pa. par.)

"Regent of the gown'd race."

Cowper: Death of Vice-Chancellor.

B. Intrans.: To put on a gown; to dress one's self in a gown.

gown's-man, gown-man, s. [Eng. gown, and man.]

1. A member of one of the learned professions; one whose professional dress is a gown, as a lawyer, a professor at the universities, &c.

"A loud murmur of applause arose from the gownsmen who filled the hall."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. viii.

2. One devoted to the arts of peace, in contradistinction to a soldier.

"A soldier who ran away from a battle, and a gownsmen who pushed himself into a battle were the two objects which most strangely excited William's spleen."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xvi.

gōw'-pēn, gōw'-pīn, gōw'-pīng, s. [Icel. gawpn, gūpn=the hollow of the hand; Sw. göpn.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The hollow of the hand, when contracted in a semi-circular form to receive anything. Goupins, both hands held together in the form of a round vessel.

2. A handful.

II. Scots Law: One of the perquisites allowed to a miller's servant.

gōw'-pēn, gōw'-pīn, v. t. [GOWPEN, s.] To lift, or lace out, with the hands spread out and placed together.

gōw'-pēn-fūl, gōw'-pīn-fūl, s. [Eng. gowpen; -ful(1).] A handful.

gōwt, s. [GOTE (1), s.] A sluice in a sea-embankment for letting out the land-water when the tide is out, and preventing the ingress of sea-water.

gōz'-zard, s. [A corrupt. of gooseherd.]

Anat.: Small follicles in the human ovary containing ova.

grāb, v. t. & i. [Sw. grabba=to grasp.] [GRAP-PLE, GRIP, GRUPE.]

A. Trans.: To seize, clutch, or grasp suddenly or eagerly.

B. Intrans.: To make a clutch or grab at.

grab-bag, s. A bag containing small articles, which are to be drawn, without being seen, on payment of a small sum of money. In common use at church fairs.

grab-gains, s. The act of thieving by snatching a purse, &c., suddenly and running away with it.

grāb (1), s. [GRAB, v.]

1. Ord. Lang.: A sudden grasp, clutch, or seizing of anything.

2. Mach.: An instrument for clutching objects for the purpose of raising them. The term is specially applied to devices for withdrawing pipes, drills, reamers, &c., from artesian, oil, and other wells which are drilled, bored, or driven.

grāb (2), s. [Native name (?).]

Naut.: A large East Indian coaster, two-masted, with a prow-stern, and from 150 to 300 tons' burden.

grāb-bër, s. [Eng. grab; -ër.] One who grabs or seizes suddenly or eagerly. [LAND-GRABBER.]

"A tenant farmer, whom Mr. — denounced as a land grabber."—London Daily Telegraph.

grāb'-ble (1), grā'-ble, v. i. [A frequent. of grab (q. v.); cf. Dut. grabbelen=to snatch; Ger. grübeln=to grab.] [GRAPPLE, GROPE.] To grope, to feel about.

"And so [Cato] went forward at adventure, taking extreme and incredible pains, and in much danger of his life, grabbing all night in the dark without moonlight."—North: Plutarch, p. 294.

grāb'-ble (2), v. i. [GROVEL.] To grovel; to lie on the ground prostrate; to sprawl.

grāce, gras, s. [Fr., from Lat. gratia=favor, from gratus=dear, pleasing, from the same root as Gr. chairō=to rejoice; chara=joy; charis=grace, favor; Eng. yearn.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Favor, kindness, good-will; disposition to oblige.

"Or each, or all, may win a lady's grace."

Dryden: Palamon and Arcite, ii. 394.

2. In the same sense as II. 5.

"Judgment, umpire in the strife,
That Grace and Nature have to wage through life."

Cowper: Tirocinium, 30.

3. Pardon, mercy.

"Wilt thou kneel for grace?"

Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. III., ii. 2.

4. A favor conferred; a kindness.

"Certis said he, I n'll thinne offred grace Ne to be made so happy doe intend."

Spenser: F. Q., II. vii. 38.

5. An allowance granted as a favor, not as of right; as, to give a person ten minutes' grace to keep an appointment.

*6. Honorable distinction; honor.

"Do grace to them and bring them in."

Shakesp.: Hamlet, ii. 2.

7. A privilege.

"But to return and view the cheerful skies,
To few great Jupiter imparts this grace."

Dryden: Virgil's Æneid, iv. 196.

8. That element or characteristic in behavior, deportment, or language which renders it elegant, graceful, or pleasing; elegance in action or language.

"In this case, the roundness, this delicacy of attitude and motion, it is that all the magic of grace consists."—Burke: On the Sublime and Beautiful, § 22.

9. Any excellence which conciliates love or makes pleasing to others; any endowment or quality which recommends the possessor to the favor, liking, respect, or esteem of other persons.

"Nothing could be more natural than that graces and accomplishments like his should win a female heart."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xv.

10. An embellishment, an ornament, a beauty.

11. Pl.: A game designed to promote or display grace of motion. It consists in passing a small hoop from one to another by means of two short sticks.

12. An affectation of refinement, dignity, or elegance.

*13. Virtue, power, quality.

"O, mickle is the powerful grace that lies In plants, herbs, stones, and their true qualities."

Shakesp.: Romeo and Juliet, ii. 3.

14. A form of respect used in addressing or speaking of an archbishop or a duke; formerly used also of a sovereign.

"High and mighty king, your grace, and those your nobles here present, may be pleased to bow your ears."—Bacon: Henry VII.

*15. A blessed disposition of mind; virtue.

"If you have any pity, grace, or manners."

Shakesp.: Midsummer Night's Dream, ii. 2.

*16. Thanks.

"Yeldinge graces and thankings to here lord Melibe."

Chaucer: Tale of Melibee, p. 193.

17. A short prayer before or after meat; a blessing asked or thanks returned.

"Your soldiers use him as the grace 'fore meat."

Shakesp.: Coriolanus, iv. 1.

II. Technically:

1. Greek Myth.: One of three sister goddesses, called Aglaia, Thalia, and Euphrosyne, daughters of Jupiter and the ocean nymph Eurynome. In their gift were grace, loveliness, and favor. By the Greeks they were known as Charitēs, and by the Romans as Gratiæ.

2. Eng. Law: A faculty, license, or dispensation; a general or free pardon by Act of Parliament; called also an Act of Grace.

"Between an Act of Grace originating with the sovereign and an Act of Indemnity originating with the Estates of the Realm there are some remarkable distinctions. An Act of Indemnity passes through all the stages through which other laws pass, and may during its progress be amended by either House. An Act of Grace is received with peculiar marks of respect, is read only once by the Lords and once by the Commons, and must be either rejected altogether or accepted as it stands."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xv.

¶ In the United States, the pardons extended to criminals by the President, the governor of a state or a state board of pardons are of the nature of acts of grace.

3. Music: A general term for ornamental notes or short passages, introduced as embellishments into vocal or instrumental music, not actually essential to its harmony or melody. In former times, in vocal music, the selection of graces was left to the judgment of the performer to a great extent, but in instrumental music numerous signs have, from time to time, been used, explanations of which will be found under their distinctive names. In our own time a reaction has taken place against the absurd embellishments indulged in by our forefathers, and it has become fashionable to sing and play music just as it is written. This is perhaps to be regretted, as those who are rendering music should carefully consider whether the writer wished ornaments to be excluded or omitted to write them under a belief that they would certainly be introduced in performance. (Stainer & Barrett.) [CADENZA.]

4. Univ.: An act, vote, or decree of the senate or governing body.

"What I mean is in relation to the grace, which the assertors of the right of appeal thought fit to propose, in order to refer the decision of this point to the arbitration of the senate."—Hurd: Opinions of an Eminent Lawyer.

5. Script.: The word grace with a religious meaning is used in many senses in Scripture. The most distinctive are:

(1) Unmerited favor (Rom. iii. 24, iv. 4). It is opposed to debt—i. e., is not a payment of debt (Rom. iv. 4)—and to works—i. e., it is not merited by good works (ibid.). It is called the grace of God (Titus ii. 11), and the grace of Our Lord Jesus Christ (Acts xv. 11; 2 Cor. xiii. 14). By the "grace of God" is meant His love for mankind, as evinced by sending His Son into the world to make atonement for sin and offer salvation through faith in His blood (Eph. xi. 7, 8; Acts xx.). "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ" signifies His loving favor as evinced by His undertaking and carrying out this mission of mercy (2 Cor. viii. 9).

(2) The results of such favor; privilege, as of apostleship, &c. (Ephes. iii. 8; 1 Peter i. 10.)

(3) The transforming influence of the Spirit of God. (Acts xviii. 21.)

(4) The results of such influence, spiritual and moral character, conduct, and conversation and attainments, &c. (2 Cor. viii. 6; Col. iv. 6). In this sense the Christian is supposed to have many graces; as, for instance, the grace of liberality (2 Corinth. viii. 7).

(5) Loving character, benevolence, suavity, sympathy. Used preeminently of Jesus. In this sense it is sometimes coupled with truth (John i. 14, 17).

6. Ch. Hist.: Such doctrines as those relating to the decrees of God, predestination, freewill, and the operations of the Holy Spirit on the human conscience, are often called the Doctrines of Grace. A great contest arose on the subject in the fifth century, the antagonistic views being those of Pelagius and Celestius, who gave much prominence to the tenet of man's natural ability to do what is right [PELAGIANISM, SEMIPELAGIANISM], and of Augustine, who, strongly holding the sovereignty of God, the natural depravity of man, and the spiritual inability thus resulting, attributed the salvation of the latter solely to Divine grace, with little of human co-operation. The controversy thus commenced went on with intermissions for some centuries. At the Reformation Luther held views essentially Augustinian, as did most of the other reformers. Calvin formulated them as one of his five points. [CALVINISM.] In the next century the antagonistic system of Arminianism was also formulated and urged upon the church. [ARMINIANISM.] It leans in the direction of Pelagianism, but stops considerably short of that system in its extreme form.

bōl, bōy; pōūt, jōwl; cat, cell, chorus, chin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f
-cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shūn;

-tion, -sion = zhūn. -tious, -clous, -sious = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bəl, dəl.

† (1) *To do grace:

- (a) To embellish, to become well, to set off.
"Mourning doth thee grace."—Shakesp.: Sonnet 132.
(b) To reflect credit upon.
"To do the profession some grace."
Shakesp.: Henry IV., Pt. I., li. 1.

(2) Day of grace:

- (a) Law: [DAY, C. 4 (1).]
(b) Theol.: The time during which divine grace is obtainable by one who seeks it in prayer; the period during which probation extends—i. e., during which one is in this world. The expression "day of grace" does not occur in Scripture; it is regarded as the same in meaning with day of salvation in 2 Cor. vi. 2. This again is a quotation from Isa. xlix. 8. Cf. also Heb. iv. 7, which is a quotation from Psalm xciv. 7, 8. Day of grace is the opposite of the day of wrath, Rom. ii. 5.
"That day of grace fleets fast away."—Watts.

(3) Days of grace:

- Comm.: [DAY, C. 4 (2).]
(4) Means of grace:
Theol.: Means through which Divine grace may be expected to operate. (Often used of attendance on Christian worship.)

(5) Throne of grace:

Script.: A figurative expression, the literal meaning of which would be a throne from which God dispenses His loving favor.

(6) To come to the throne of grace: To approach God in prayer (Heb. iv. 16).

(7) To get into (or to be in) one's good graces: To become (or be) in favor or friendship with one.

(8) With a good grace: Gracefully, graciously; with a show of willingness and pleasure.

"What might have been done with a good grace would at last be done with a bad grace."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. iv.

(9) With a bad grace: Ungraciously, ungracefully.

(1) Crabb thus discriminates between grace and favor: "Grace is never used but in regard to those who have offended and made themselves liable to punishment; favor is employed for actual good. . . . The term favor is employed indiscriminately with regard to man or his Maker; those who are in power have the greatest opportunity of conferring favours; but all we receive at the hands of our Maker must be acknowledged as a favor."

(2) He thus discriminates between grace and charm: "Grace is altogether corporeal; charm is either corporeal or mental: the grace qualifies the action of the body, the charm is an inherent quality in the body itself. A lady moves, dances, and walks with grace; the charms of her person are equal to those of the mind." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

"Grace-drink, s. The designation commonly given to the drink taken by a company, after the giving of thanks at the end of a meal; a grace-cup.
"To this queen [Margaret, Malcolm Canmore's queen] tradition says we owe the custom of the grace-drink; she having established it as a rule at her table, that whoever staid till grace was said, was rewarded with a bumper."—Encycl. Britann., s. v. Forfar.

grace-notes, s. pl.
Music: [GRACE, s., II. 3.]

grace-stroke, s. A finishing touch or stroke; a coup-de-grace.
"To perfect and give the grace-stroke to that very liberal education."—Scotland Characterized (1701) in Hart. Miscell., vii. 377.

grâce, v. t. [GRACE, s.]

I. Ordinary Language:

*1. To adorn, to decorate, to set off.
"Ten hardy striplings, all in bright attire,
And graced with shining weapons."
Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. vii.

*2. To add grace or dignity to; to endow.
"With many a social virtue graced."
Longfellow: Tales of a Wayside Inn. (Prel.)

*3. To celebrate.
"And indeed great reason it was, that he that was Lord of Heaven should have his descending into the flesh graced and owned with the testimonies of stars and angels."—South: Sermons, vol. xi., ser. 4.

*4. To dignify or raise by an act of favor; to honor.
"He might at his pleasure grace or disgrace whom he would in court."—Knotles: History of the Turks.

*5. To exalt; to praise.
"I will grace the attempt for a worthy exploit."
Shakesp.: All's Well that Ends Well, iii. 6.

*6. To favor; to oblige.
"O'er these waste downs whereon I lost myself."
Tennyson: Elaine, 224.

*7. To supply with heavenly grace.
"Grace the disobedient."—Bp. Hall.

II. Music: To add grace-notes, cadenzas, &c., to.

*grâ'ce-cûp, s. [Eng. grace, and cup.]

1. A cup or vessel in which a health is drank after grace.
2. A health drank after grace.
"The gracecup follows to his Sovereign's health."
King: Art of Cookery, 276.

grâ'ce, pa. par. & a. [GRACE, v.]

A. As pa. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As adjective:

1. Endowed with graces; graceful; elegant; dignified.
"He saw this gentleman, one of the properest and best graced men that ever I saw, being of a middle age and a mean stature."—Sidney: Arcadia.
*2. Virtuous, chaste, honorable.
"More like a tavern or a brothel, Than a graced palace."
Shakesp.: Lear, i. 4.

grâ'ce-fûl, a. [Eng. grace; -ful (1).]

1. Full of or displaying grace or beauty in form or action; elegant; neat; handsome.
"My boy was by my side, so slim
And graceful in his rustic dress."
Wordsworth: Anecdote for Fathers.

2. Elegant, well-chosen, becoming.

"He took his seat there with the mace at his right hand, rose, and in a few graceful words returned his thanks."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiv.

† (1) Crabb thus discriminates between graceful, comely, and elegant: "A graceful figure is rendered so by the deportment of the body. A comely figure has that in itself which pleases the eye. Elegant is applicable, like graceful, to the motion of the body, or like comely, to the person, and is extended in its meaning also to the words and even to the dress. A person's step is graceful; his air or his movements are elegant; the grace of an action lies chiefly in its adaptation to the occasion." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

(2) For the difference between graceful and becoming, see BECOMING.

grâ'ce-fûl-lÿ, adv. [Eng. graceful; -ly.] In a graceful or elegant manner; elegantly; with gracefulness or elegance of manner or deportment.

"Lamps gracefully disposed, and of all hues, Illumined every side." Cowper: Task, v. 149.

grâ'ce-fûl-nêss, s. [Eng. graceful; -ness.] The quality or state of being graceful; grace; elegance of manner or deportment; dignity with beauty.

"In like manner the flowers and adornments of Moral Philosophy, are apt and serviceable for the affecting and entertaining our Imagination by the gracefulness and elegance of their persuasions."—Mountagu: Devout Essays, pt. i., tr. 19, § 3.

grâ'ce-lêss, grace-lesse*, a. [Eng. grace; -less.] Void of grace or dignity; corrupt; depraved; abandoned.

"A graceless heart."—Cowper: Olney Hymns, lviii.

grâ'ce-lêss-lÿ, adv. [Eng. graceless; -ly.] In a graceless manner; without grace or elegance.

"The French, in his whole language, hath not one word that hath his accent in the last syllable, saving two, called antepenultima; and little more hath the Spanish; and therefore very gracelessly may they use dactyle."—Sidney: Defence of Poesy.

grâ'ce-lêss-nêss, s. [Eng. graceless; -ness.] The quality or state of being graceless.

grâ'ce-lâr-lÿ, s. [Lat. gracil(is)=thin, slender, and suff. -aria.]

"The call of Abraham from a heathen state, represents the gracious call of Christians to forsake the wickedness of the world."—Gilpin: Sermons, vol. ii., ser. 16.

*5. In a state of heavenly grace; virtuous.
"Kings are no less unhappy, their issue not being gracious than they are in losing them when they have approved their virtues."—Shakesp.: Winter's Tale, iv. 2.

*6. Acceptable; finding favor or grace; agreeable.
"Is he gracious in the people's eyes?"
Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. III., iii. 3.

*7. Proceeding from, or produced by divine grace.
*8. Tending to bring into a state of grace; as, a gracious sermon.

*9. Happy, fortunate, prosperous, favorable.
"Gracious be the issue."
Shakesp.: Winter's Tale, iii. 1.

10. Graceful, attractive, elegant, comely, beautiful.
"No face so gracious is as mine."
Shakesp.: Sonnet 62.

† (1) Gracious is used as a mild oath or interjection.
"Married! O, my gracious! Just think of the creature's talking about it!"—Mrs. H. B. Stowe: Dred, ch. xi.

(2) Crabb thus discriminates between gracious, merciful, and kind: "Grace is exerted in doing good to an object that has merited the contrary; mercy is exerted in withholding the evil which has been merited. God is gracious to His creatures in affording them not only an opportunity to address Him, but every encouragement to lay open their wants to Him; their unworthiness and sinfulness are not made impediments of access to Him. God is merciful to the vilest of sinners, and lends an ear to the smallest breath of repentance; in the moment of executing vengeance He stops His arm at the voice of supplication; He expects the same mercy to be extended by man toward his offending brother. Gracious, when compared with kind, differs principally as to the station of the persons to whom it is applied. Gracious is altogether confined to superiors; kind is indiscriminately employed for superiors and equals." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) grâ'-ci-ous-lÿ, grâ'-ci-ous-liche*, grâ'-cy-ous-lÿ*, grâ'-cy-ous-lye*, adv. [Eng. gracious; -ly.]

"Graciously to know I am no better."
Shakesp.: Measure for Measure, ii. 4.

grâ'-ci-ous-nêss, s. [Eng. gracious; -ness.]

1. The quality or state of being gracious, favorable, merciful, kind, or benignant; kind condescension.
"The graciousness and temper of this answer made no impression on them; but they proceeded in their usual manner."—Clarendon: Civil War, i. 326.

*2. The quality or state of being acceptable; acceptability.
"Then it is [when a sinner repents] that our blessed Lord feels the fruits of his holy death, the acceptance of his holy sacrifice, the graciousness of his person, the return of his prayers."—Bp. Taylor: Sermons, vol. i., ser. 1.

grâ'c-kle*, s. [Lat. graculus=a jackdaw; from the sound made by the bird.] A bird of the genus Gracula (q. v.).

grâ'c-u-lâ, s. [Lat. graculus=a jackdaw, according to Quintilian, from its note, gra, gra.]

Eccles.: A gradual (q. v.).

grā'-dāte, v. t. [GRADE, v.]

1. To make harmonize, as colors in painting.
2. To bring up to a certain strength or grade; as, to grade a solution.

grā-dā'-tion, s. [Fr., from Lat. gradationem, acc. of gradatio=an ascent by steps; gradus=a step; Sp. graduación; Ital. gradazione.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A moving or progressing by degrees; a regular advance or progression from step to step.

"The Chinitians therefore do use a kinde of gradation in advancing men vnto sundry places of authority."—Hackluyt: Voyages, vol. ii., pt. ii., p. 94.

2. A step or degree in any order, series, or sequence.

"It preserves the same superiority through all the subordination gradations."—Burke: On the Sublime and Beautiful, pt. ii., § 6.

3. Arrangement in order according to size, quality, rank, degree of advancement, &c.; sequence.

"If each system in gradation roll Alike essential to th' amazing whole."
Pope: Essay on Man, i. 247.

II. Technically:

1. Art: The just arrangement or subordination of the parts of any work, so as to produce the best effect; as, the gradation of color and light in painting, to express depth and relief, to define distances, and to show the state of the atmosphere.

2. Logic: A regular advance from step to step, as in an argument.

3. Music: An ascending or descending by a regular succession of chords.

4. Rhet.: An ascending or descending in terms, as toward a climax. (Wilson: Art of Rhetorique, p. 207.)

B. As adv.: Decently, properly, becomingly.

grād'-ēr, s. [Eng. grade; -er.] A machine used for grading; a grading-machine.

grā'-di-ent, a. & s. [Lat. gradiens, pr. par. of gradior=to walk; gradus=a step.]

A. As adjective:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Walking, moving, or advancing by steps.

"Amongst those gradient automata, that iron spider is especially remarkable, which, being but of an ordinary bigness, did creep up and down as if it had been alive."—Wilkins: Dædalus, bk. ii., ch. iv.

- *2. Rising or falling by regular degrees of inclination; as, the gradient line of a road.

II. Her.: A term applied to the tortoise, as supposed to be walking.

B. As substantive:

1. The rate of ascent or descent in a railway or road; a grade; the degree of slope or inclination of the ground over which a railway, road, &c., passes; as, The gradient is 1 in 100; that is, the ground rises one foot in every hundred feet.

2. A part of a road, &c., which slopes upward or downward; a slope.

Railroad Engineering:

1. A post placed by the side of the track, at a change of grade, carrying a board slanted to the slope, and indicating in figures the grade in feet per 100, or otherwise.

2. A stake set in the ground, and marked to indicate the proper height of an embankment or of road metal at that point.

grā'-dīn, grā'-dī-ne, s. [Fr. gradin=a step, from Lat. gradus.]

1. One of a series of seats rising one above another.

C. As subst.: The act or process of reducing to a certain grade or level.

grading-instrument, s. A level with an alidade, a transit, or other sighting instrument, by which the angle of inclination of a slope may be measured, or a row of stakes driven to mark a given gradient.

grading-plow, s. A kind of plow used for breaking up soil or plowing down banks, in order to fit the earth for being scooped up by the earth-scraper, and thereby deposited.

grading-scraper, s. A large two-handled shovel, drawn by horses, and used as an earth-scoop for raising and removing loosened earth. It is used in road-making, scooping out beds of canals in certain situations, &c., when the soil is suitable, and the distance where it is to be deposited is not too great. [HORSE-SHOVEL.]

grād'-u-al, a. & s. [Low Lat. gradualis, from gradus=a step; Fr. gradual; Ital. graduale; Sp. gradual.]

A. As adj.: Progressing or advancing by steps or degrees; passing from one step or stage to another by regular gradations without breaks or starts; slow.

"Flowers and their fruit
Man's nourishment, by gradual scale sublimed,
To vital spirits aspire." Milton: P. L., v. 483.

B. As substantive:

- *1. Ord. Lang.: A series or order of steps.

"Before the gradual prostrate they adored,
The pavement kissed, and thus the saint implored."
Dryden.

2. Ecclesiastical:

(1) A service-book, containing the hymns or prayers to be sung by the choir, so called from certain short phrases after the Epistle sung in gradibus (upon the steps of the altar).

(2) That part of the service of the mass in the Roman Catholic Church which immediately follows the Epistle, and is sung as the deacon returns to the steps of the altar.

Eccles. & Ch. Hist.: Fifteen psalms, from Ps. cxx. to Ps. cxxiv. inclusive; so called because they were formerly chanted from the steps of the choir, more especially during Advent. [SONGS OF DEGREES.]

grād'-u-ā-lē, s. [Low Latin.] The same as GRADUAL, B. 2.

grād'-u-āl'-l-tŷ, s. [Eng. gradual; -ity.] The quality or state of being gradual; regular progression or gradation.

"Which while some ascribe unto the mixture of the elements, others to the graduality of opacity and light, they have left our endeavors to grope them out by twilight."—Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. vi., ch. x.

grād'-u-āl-lŷ, adv. [Eng. gradual; -ly.]

1. In a gradual manner, by degrees; step by step, slowly; in regular gradations.

"Already the designs of the court began gradually to unfold themselves."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. vi.

- *2. In degree.

"Human reason doth not only gradually, but specifically, differ from the fantastic reason of brutes."—Grew.

grād'-u-āl-nēss, s. [Eng. gradual; -ness.] The quality or state of being gradual; graduality.

"The gradualness of this movement and the obscurity which enwrapped its beginnings."—M. Arnold: Study of Celtic Literature, p. 94.

grād'-u-and, s. [As if from the gerundive participle of an imaginary Low Lat. word graduor. So in the Scottish universities there is a word magistrand, from a Low Lat. verb magistror.] One who has passed all the examinations for a degree, but has not yet been capped.

grād'-u-āte, v. t. & i. [Low Lat. graduatus=one who has taken a degree; Lat. gradus=a step, a degree; Ital. graduare; Sp. & Port. graduar; Fr. grader.]

A. Transitive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. To mark with degrees or a scale.

"The places were marked where the spirit stood at the severest cold and greatest heat, and according to these observations he graduates his thermometers."—Derham: Physico-Theology, bk. i., ch. ii. (note 3).

2. To mark or arrange with degrees or differences; as, to graduate punishment according to the nature of the offense.

"Then it evidently follows that, if there were any such action in the next life, the pure soul would apply itself thereunto according to the proportion of her judgments, and as they are graduated and qualified."—Digby: Of Man's Soul, ch. ii.

3. To confer a degree upon in a university; to dignify with a degree or diploma.

- *4. To prepare gradually.

graft, s. [GRAFT, v.]

1. Lit.: A small scion or shoot of a tree inserted or grafted in another tree, as the stock which is to support and nourish it. The two unite and become one, but the fruit is determined by the graft.

"The slimy snail, the worm, and laboring ant, Which many times annoy the graft and tender plant." Drayton: Polyolbion, s. 18.

2. Fig.: Anything inserted or incorporated in a thing to which it did not originally belong; an addition.

"It is false husbandry to graft old branches upon young stocks."—Davenant: Gondibert. (Pref.)

graft, graf, v. t. & i. [O. Fr. graffe, grafe=a style for writing, a sort of pencil; Fr. greffe=a graft or graft; from the shape of the cut slip, which resembles a pointed pencil; Low Latin graphiotum=(1) a small style; (2) a graft, or shoot; Lat. graphium=a style; Gr. graphion, grapeion=a style or pencil; graphō=to write. The correct form of the word is graft.]

A. Transitive:

1. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: In the same sense as II.

2. Fig.: To insert or incorporate in a body to which that which is inserted or incorporated did not originally belong; to join or attach one thing on to another.

"These are the Italian names, which fate will join With ours, and graft upon the Trojan line." Dryden: Virgil's Æneid, vi. 1,028.

II. Technically:

1. Carp.: To attach or join one piece of timber to another by scarfing.

2. Husb.: To insert as a scion or shoot in another tree; to fix a graft or grafts upon; to propagate by grafting.

"Old crab-trees here at home, that will not Be grafted to your relish." Shakesp.: Coriolanus, ii. 1.

3. Naut.: To unlay the two ends of a rope, placing the strands one within the other as for splicing and stopping them at the joint.

4. Surg.: To transplant a portion of skin to a denuded surface.

B. Intrans.: To carry out the process or operation of grafting.

"To have fruit in greater plenty, the way is to graft, not only upon your stocks, but upon divers boughs of an old tree; for they will bear great numbers of fruit; whereas if you graft but upon one stock, the tree can bear but few."—Bacon.

graf, pa. par. & a. [GRAFF, v.] Grafted; impregnated with a scion.

"Her face defaced with scars of infamy, Her royal stock graft with ignoble plants." Shakesp.: Richard III., iii. 7.

graf-ēr, s. [Eng. graft; -er.]

1. One who grafts; one who propagates plants or shrubs by grafting.

"I am informed by the trials of more than one of the most skillful and experienced grafters of these parts, that a man shall seldom fail of having cherries borne by his graft the same year in which the incision is made."—Boyle: Works, i. 341.

2. A tree from which a scion is taken to be inserted in another.

"Shall a few sprays of us The emptying of our father's luxury, Our scions, put in wild and savage stock, Spirt up so suddenly into the clouds, And overlook their grafters?" Shakesp.: Henry V., iii. 5.

graft-lŋg, pr. par., a. & s. [GRAFT, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As substantive:

1. Carp.: A scarfing or endwise attachment of one timber to another, as in attaching an extra length or false pile to one already driven.

2. Husb.: The act or process of inserting a shoot or scion taken from one tree or shrub in a vigorous stock of its own or a closely allied species, so as to cause them to unite and enable the graft to derive a larger supply of nutritive power than it could otherwise obtain. There are numerous methods of grafting. One is grafting by approach, or inarching, when two growing plants are united together, and after adhesion one is severed from its own stock and left to grow on the other. This kind of adhesion sometimes takes place naturally in trees growing close together. The usual method of grafting is by scions or slips, which are applied to the stock by a sloping surface, or are inserted into slits in it by cleft-grafting, or into perforations by wimble or peg-grafting. Sometimes several slips are placed in a circular manner around the inside of the bark of the stock, by crown-grafting; or the bark of a portion of the stock is removed, and that of the scion is hollowed out, so as to be applied over it like the parts of a flute, hence called flute-grafting. Budding is practiced by the removal of a bud from one plant, along with the portion of the bark and new wood, and applying it to another plant, in which a similar wound has been made. In whip-grafting, or tongue-grafting, the stock is cut obliquely across, and a slit or very narrow angular incision is made in its center downward across the cut surface, a similar deep incision being made in the scion upward at a corresponding angle, and a projecting tongue left, which, being inserted in the incision in the stock, they are fastened closely together. Splice-grafting is performed by cutting the ends of both the stock and the scion across at such an angle that the oblique surfaces exactly fit each other, and are fastened together. In saddle-grafting the end of the stock is cut into the form of a wedge, and the middle of the scion cut away so as to rest exactly upon the stock. Grafting is usually performed between the woody parts of the plants, but herbaceous parts may also be united in this way. It is requisite that the growing parts be brought into apposition—the two albumens and the two libers. Union will only take place where the active processes of life are freely exercised. The graft and stock are secured together by means of clay, or a mixture of bees'-wax and tallow, or by bits of india-rubber.

3. Naut.: The tapering of the end of a rope, usually covered by weaving yarns around it.

4. Surg.: The transplanting of a portion of skin to a denuded surface.

grafting-chisel, s.

Husb.: A kind of chisel for splitting a stock for the insertion of a scion.

grafting-knife, s. A knife having a blade for splitting a limb and a wedge for opening the cleft for the insertion of the scion.

grafting-saw, s. A tenon-saw for cutting off stocks for grafting; a pruning-saw.

grafting-tool, s. A very strong spade, much curved across the blade; used in digging canals.

graft-lŋg, s. [Eng. graft; dimin. suff. -ling.] A little or tender graft or scion.

Graham bread, s. Bread made from unbolted wheat flour. It obtained its name from Sylvester Graham, a celebrated lecturer on dietetics.

Grā-ham-ite, s. [Named after Graham, a friend of Wurtz.]

Min.: A mineral, supposed to be inspissated and oxygenated petroleum; hardness, 2; specific gravity, 1.145. Found in West Virginia, filling a fissure in a sandstone of Carboniferous age. (Dana.)

grail (1), graille (1), grayle (1), s. [O. Fr. greel; from Low Lat. gradale.] The same as GRADUAL (B. 2).

"The old Polish service-books were still preserved and used by curates, as they stood affected: of which there were divers and sundry sorts, according to the various religious offices, such as antiphonals, missals, grails, processions, &c."—Strype: Memorials; Edward VI., an. 1549.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hār, there; plne, plt, sire, sir, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fāll; trŷ, sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

*grail (2), *graille (2), *grayle (2), s. [O. Fr. graille; from Lat. gracilis=slender.]

1. Small particles of any kind; sand, gravel.

2. One of the small feathers of a hawk.

*grail (3), *graille (3), *grayle (3), s. [O. Fr. grail, grail, grasale=a flat dish; from Low Lat. gradale, grasale.] Properly applied to the legendary dish used at the Last Supper, said to have been stolen by a servant of Pilate, used by him to wash his hands in before the multitude, afterward given to Joseph of Arimathea as a memorial of Christ, and finally used by Joseph while hanging on the cross. "This," said He (Christ), "is the holy dish wherein sate the lamb on St. Kethin's day." (Malory: Morte Arthure, bk. xvii., ch. xx.) The word (which is commonly qualified by the adjective sacred, saint, sayn, sant=holy) was afterward applied to the cup used at the Last Supper. According to one legend, the Holy Grail was brought by Joseph of Arimathea to England where he settled at Glastonbury about A. D. 63. Finally it was transported to India, where it still remains. In A. D. 1101 the Crusaders, at the capture of Caesarea, found what they believed to be the veritable Holy Grail, a dish made of a single large emerald. It is now preserved in the Cathedral of San Lorenzo, in Genoa. Another legend says that the holy vessel was brought from heaven by angels, and intrusted to the care of a body of knights, who guarded and watched it on the top of a high mountain, and was invisible to any one not perfectly pure. The search, or quest, for the Holy Grail after its loss or disappearance, formed the subject of numerous romances or poems, such as those of Arthur and the Knights of the Round Table.

"And when King Arthur made
His table round, and all men's hearts became Clean for a season, surely he had thought That now the Holy Grail would come again."

Tennyson: The Holy Grail.

graille, s. [Etym. doubtful; cf. O. Fr. graille; Fr. grêle=slender.] A single-cut file or float, having one curved and one straight face. It is used by comb-makers.

grain, *grayn, *grein, *greyn, s. [Fr. grain; from Lat. granum=a grain, corn; cogn. with corn (q. v.).]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A single seed of a plant. (Particularly used of those plants the seeds of which are used as food for man.)

"His reasons are as two grains of wheat hid in two bushels of chaff; you shall seek all ere you find them."—Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, i. 1.

2. Used collectively, and without a definite, for corn in general, or the fruit of cereal plants, as wheat, barley, rye, &c. In America restricted to the grain of wheat.

"For winter drought rewards the peasant's pain,
And broods indulgent—the buried grain."
Dryden: Virgil; Georgic i. 148.

3. Those plants the seeds of which constitute the food of man; cereal plants, as wheat, barley, oats, &c.

"The same Grecians preferred before all other grains those three sorts, to wit, Dracontias, Strangias, and Selnusium."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. xviii., ch. vii.

4. (Pl.): [GRAINS.]

Any small, hard particle, as of sand, sugar, &c.

"The people there inhabiting used to set many fleeces of wool in those descents of waters in which the grains of gold remain."—Raleigh: History of the World, bk. ii., ch. xiii., § 7.

6. Hence, used for a minute portion or particle, the smallest particle or amount.

"Do they [worldly goods] either recommend him more to God or wise men, or even to himself, if he have a grain of sense in him, than if he was without them?"—Sharp: Sermons, vol. i., ser. 4.

7. One of the constituent particles of a body, as of a metal, a stone, &c.

8. The body or substance of anything considered with respect to the form or direction of the constituent particles; the form or appearance of the surface of a body with respect to the quality or arrangement of the particles.

"When any side of it was cut smooth and polite, it appeared to have a very lovely grain, like that of some curious close wood."—Evelyn: Forest Trees, ch. xxx., § 12.

9. The arrangement or direction of the fibers of wood or other fibrous substance.

"The marks of the grain of the wood . . . have been found upon celts."—Evans: Ancient Bronze Implements, ch. vi.

10. The body or substance of wood with respect to the arrangement, quality, or direction of the constituent fibers.

"Here are forests of vast extent, full of the straightest, the cleanest, and the largest timber trees that we have ever seen; their size, their grain, and apparent durability, render them fit for any kind of building."—Cook: First Voyage, bk. ii., ch. vii.

grain-bin, s. A box or compartment in which grain is stored in a granary or elevator.

grain-binder, s. An attachment to a harvester for binding a gavel into a sheaf.

grain-bruiser, s. A machine for mashing grain for feed, to render it more digestible. It does not grind but crushes the kernel, corn, or oats. It has two iron rollers of different diameters, turned by connecting cog-wheels of the same size, so that a rubbing is added to the crushing action.

grain-cleaner, s.

1. A machine in which wheat, oats, rye, and barley are separated from their chaff, dust, and pieces of straw, the result of the thrashing operation; a fanning or winnowing machine.

2. The shoe or cleaning portion of a thrashing-machine, which acts after the thrasher and the straw-carrier.

3. A machine in which grain is rid of cockle, garlic, &c., which are so nearly the size and weight of the grain that the size of mesh and strength of blast of the fanning-mill are ineffective.

4. A machine in which grain is rubbed, brushed, and blown to remove smut and dust.

grain-conveyor, s. [ELEVATOR, II. 2, 3.]

grain-cradle, s. [CRADLE, B. 8 (1).]

grain-damper, s. A device for applying steam to grain to scald the bran and facilitate the process of decortication. A jet of steam entering a tube where the grain descends a series of inclines is a usual method.

grain-drier, s. An apparatus or machine in which damp grain is dried, or grain in ordinary condition is kiln-dried to fit it for ocean shipment.

grain-drill, s. A machine for sowing grain in drills or rows.

grain-fork, s. A light fork with long, curved tines, used for pitching gavels of cut grain on to a wagon, when the straw is too short for convenient binding.

grain-gauge, s. [GRAIN-TESTER.]

grain-huller, s. A machine for taking the cortex or skin from grain, making hulled wheat, pearl barley, hominy, &c.; a decorticator.

grain-leather, s.

Entom.: Two moths, the larvæ of which feed on grain. They are Pinea granella and Butalis cerealella. The perfect insects have narrow wings of satiny luster, and with marginal fringes.

grain-rake, s.

1. A rake used in raking grain in the swath into gavels for binding.

2. A rake used by one who rides on the reaper in raking gavels from the platform of the machine.

grain-sacker, s. A device for loading grain into sacks.

grain-scourer, s. A machine for cleaning grain; a smut-mill, a machine in which grain is rubbed and chafed, and eventually sorted into qualities by gravity and blast.

grain-screen, s. A shaking sieve, or a rotating cylindrical reel of wire-cloth in which grain is sorted by quality, according to its ability to pass through the meshes of the sieve.

grain-separator, s. A thrashing-machine.

grain-shovel, s. A shovel for handling grain in sacks on the floor of a kiln, granary, or warehouse, or in the hold of a vessel where it is in bulk.

grain-tester, s. A means for weighing small quantities, as samples of grain. The cup has a known capacity, as a certain aliquot part of a bushel, and the divisions on the scale indicate the pounds which a bushel of the grain tested would weigh.

grain-tin, s. Crystalline tin ore. Metallic tin smelted with charcoal. Tin reduced from the loose grains of tin stone. [STREAM-TIN.]

*grain (2), *grane, *grayn, *greyn, s. [Icel. grain=a branch; Sw. gren; Dan. green.]

1. A branch of a tree.

2. A stalk or stem of a plant.

3. The branches of a valley where it divides into two; the point of juncture of two rivers; a branch of a river.

4. A blade, as of a sword or knife.

"The engines which put the letters upon the edges of the large silver pieces, and mark the edges of the rest with a graining, are wrought secretly."—Locke: Farther Considerations.

II. Technically:

1. Leather Manufacture:

(1) The process of rubbing leather with a board to raise the grain. The leather having been shaved to a thickness at the beam, and daubed, is hung up to dry, and is then folded, grain side in, and rubbed on the flesh side with a pommel or cripper to give the leather a granular appearance and render it supple. The hide is then extended and rubbed on the grain side. This is termed bruising.

(2) A process for giving markings to the surface of leather to imitate the wrinkled appearance of morocco, hog-skin, and some other leathers.

2. Paint. The imitation of the natural grain of wood by means of tools. Combs, brushes, rollers, and the corner of a folded rag are used in making the various patterns.

3. Lithog. A mode of giving a certain texture to the face of a stone. One stone is laid upon another with a quantity of sifted sand of a given fineness, and, by a peculiar oscillation and gradual progression, the surface is cut into a set of fine prominences more or less deep and distant, according to the character of the work to be placed upon the stone.

graining-board, s.

Leather Manufacture:

1. A board on which leather is spread while being grained by the cripper.

2. A board with a surface impressed or engraved with a pattern, in imitation of the natural grain of some kind of leather, and used to confer the same appearance upon the other leather by pressure.

gråm-i-næ, s. pl. [Pl. of Lat. gramen (genit. graminis)=grass.]

Bot.: The name given by Linnæus in 1751 to the fourteenth of his natural orders of plants. Jussieu in 1782 retained the name; Robert Brown in 1810 altered it to Gramineæ. Lindley's name for it is Graminaceæ (q. v.).

gråm-in-ä-çë-æ, grå-min-ë-æ, s. pl. [Lat. gramen, genit. gramin(is)=grass, and fem. pl. adj. suff. -æce, -eæ.]

Bot.: Grasses. An order of endogens, alliance Glumales. It consists of evergreen herbs, a few of them reaching a great size and living for many years. The rhizoma is fibrous or bulbous; the stem, which is covered with a coat of oil, is cylindrical, generally fistular, closed at the joints but sometimes solid; the leaves are narrow and undivided; they are alternate with a split-sheath and a ligula or membranous expansion at the junction of the stalk and blade. The flowers, which are green, are in little spikes, called locustæ, arranged in racemes or panicles. Flowers formed of imbricated bracts, the outer ones called glumes, those within them palææ, and the innermost ones scales. Glumes, two or five; palææ, two, the outer one simple, the inner composed of two, united by their continuous margins, usually two-keeled; stamens generally three, rarely one; two, four, six, or more anthers, versatile; ovary, simple; styles, two or three, distinct, more rarely combined into one; seed, one, anatropal; generally undistinguishable from the membranous pericarp; albumen farinaceous. The order has a remote affinity to the Palms (Palmaceæ), and a closer one to the Sedges (Cyperaceæ). Grasses occur in all countries and in nearly all situations. There are 250 genera, and about 4,500 species. They constitute about one-twentieth, if not even one-sixteenth, of all known plants. In individuals they transcend all other orders, but a genuine greensward fåte, fât, färe, åmidst, whât, fäll, father; wé, wét, hère, camél, hër, thère; plne, pît, sîre, sîr, marine; gô, pô, or, wöre, wolf, wörk, whô, sôn; müte, cüb, cüre, unite, cür, rôle, füll; trÿ, sÿrian. æ, æ = é; ey = ä. qu = kw.

is more common in temperate countries than in the tropics, in which the grasses grow less closely together, besides being often larger. All the cereals belong to this order, particular genera and species flourishing better in one country than in another. The order furnishes abundant fodder for cattle and horses. Sugar exists in all grasses, and is of great economic value in one; silex is made from them, also cordage, &c. Some yield a fragrant oil; a minute fraction are poisonous. The order Gramineae is divided by Lindley into thirteen tribes.

grām-i-nā'-cē-ōūs (or ceus as shūs), a. [Mod. Lat. graminaceae]; Eng., &c., suff. -ous.]

Grām-mōn'-tī-āng, Grānd'-mōn-tīng, Grān'- dī-mōn-tāng, s. pl. [From Grammont, in Limoges, Muret, near which the order was first established.]

Ch. Hist.: A monastic order founded in A. D. 1073, with the sanction of Pope Gregory VII., by Stephen of Thiers, a nobleman of Auvergne, who is sometimes called Stephen de Muret. [Etym.] His rules enjoined poverty and obedience; abstinence from animal food, which was not allowed even to the sick; as also silence, and forbade conversation with females. The lay brethren were to manage the secular affairs of the monastery while their clerical associates devoted themselves exclusively to spiritual contemplation. The reputation of the order remained high during the eleventh and twelfth centuries. Ultimately, however, variance arose between the clerical and lay brethren, and the rigor of the rules was modified, both courses tending to lower the reputation of the order in the Christian world.

Law: A body of men, consisting of not less than twelve nor more than twenty-four, respectively, returned by the sheriff of the proper county, or by the marshal of the proper district, to whom indictments are preferred. The law requires that twenty-four citizens shall be summoned to serve on the grand-jury; but in practice, not more than twenty-three are sworn, because of the inconvenience which else might arise, of having twelve, who are sufficient to find a true bill, opposed to the other twelve, who might be against it. [JURY.]

"The grand-jury, having chosen their foreman, are next instructed in the articles of their inquiry by a charge from the judge who presides upon the bench. They then withdraw to receive indictments, which are preferred to them in the name of the sovereign, but at the suit of any private prosecutor; and they are only to hear evidence on behalf of the prosecution; for the finding of an indictment is only in the nature of an inquiry or accusation, which is afterward to be tried and determined; and the grand-jury are only to inquire upon their oaths whether there be sufficient cause to call upon the party to answer it."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. iv., ch. 23.

"This grandeur and majestic show Of luxury." Milton: P. R., iv. 110.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between grandeur and magnificence: "An extensive assemblage of striking qualities in the exterior constitutes the common signification of these terms, of which grandeur is the genus and magnificence the species. Magnificence cannot exist without grandeur, but grandeur exists without magnificence: the former is distinguished from the latter both in degree and in application. When applied to the same objects they differ in degree; magnificence being the highest degree of grandeur. Grandeur is applicable to the works of nature as well as art, of mind as well as matter; magnificence is altogether the creature of art. A structure, a spectacle, an entertainment, and the like, may be grand or magnificent: but a scene, a prospect, a conception, and the like, is grand, but not magnificent." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

grând-êv-i-tÿ, grând-êv-i-tÿ, s. [Latin grandævitas, from grandis=great, and cævum=age.] Great age, long life; length of life.

*grän-er, s. [GRANARY, s.] A granary, a garner.

gränge, *grauuge, *gronge, s. [Fr. grange, from Low Lat. granea = a barn, a grange; granum = grain, corn; Sp. & Port. granja.]

*1. A barn, a granary.

"Their teeming flocks, and granges full."
Milton: Comus, 175.

2. A farmhouse or farmstead standing away at a distance from other houses or a village; applied to the residence of the bailiff of a feudal, the dwelling of a yeoman, &c.

"Till thou return, the Court I will exchange For some poor cottage, or some country grange."
Dryden: Lady Gertrude to the Earl of Surrey.

*3. The farmhouse or farmstead of a religious house, where the crops from the ground attached to the monastery and also the tithes and rent paid in kind were stored: one of the monks, called the prior of the grange, was deputed to keep the account of the farm.

"An officer out for to ride,
To sen her granges and her bernies wide."
Chaucer: C. T., 12,996.

4. A combination, society, or association of farmers for the promotion of the interests of agriculture, by abolishing the restraints and burdens imposed on it by railway and other companies, and by getting rid of the system of middlemen or agents between the producer and the consumer.

*gränge, v. t. [GRANGE, s.] Apparently, to farm.

Gräng'-ër-ize, v. t. [GRANGERISM.] To mutilate books in the manner described under Grangerism (q. v.).

Gräng'-ër-ism, s. [For etym. see def. and extract.] The practice of illustrating some particular book with engravings torn from others. As will be seen from the example under Grangerite the custom itself was known in the last century, but the name is derived from the special delight bibliophiles took in thus illustrating Granger's Biographical History of England. G. A. Sala (loc. cit.) says, on the authority of the advertisement of the fifth edition, that at its first appearance the rage to illustrate it became so prevalent that scarcely a copy of any work embellished with portraits could be found in an unutilized state.

"Grangerism, as the innocent may need to be told, is the pernicious vice of cutting plates and title-pages out of many books to illustrate one book."—Saturday Review, Jan. 29, 1883, p. 123.

Gräng'-ër-ite, s. [Granger; -ite.] One who mutilates books for the purpose of illustrating others.

"Diderot was not only a hardened Grangerite but as far in advance of his epoch, in respect of the theory of book illustration, as he was in respect of art criticism."—Saturday Review, Feb. 17, 1883, p. 207.

gran gūs-tō, s. [It.]

grä-nif-lä, s. [Sp., dimin. of grano; Latin granum=a grain, seed.] The dust or small grains of the cochineal insect.

*gran-it, a. [Eng. grain (2), s.; -it, -ed.] Forked, barbed.

*grän'-i-tar, s. [Eng. grain; -ter.] An officer belonging to a religious house, who had the charge of the granaries; a grainger.

grän'-ite, s. & a. [Ital. granito, as s.=granite, as adj.=grained, from Lat. granum=a grain, Port. granito; Fr. granit; Sp. granate. So named because the rock has a coarse granular structure.]

A. As substantive:

1. Ordinary Language:

1. In the same sense as II. 1.

2. Anything very difficult to be destroyed, as when an individual is said to have a constitution of granite.

II. Technically:

1. Petrol. & Geol.: An unstratified rock, normally consisting of three simple minerals, felspar, quartz, and mica, or, in Dana's nomenclature, of orthoclase, quartz, and mica. For a long time the universally accepted view, which is still the prevalent one, was that it is an "igneous" rock, of a "plutonic" type. The difficulty has, however, to be encountered that it is not seen in process of formation on the earth's surface. This has been met by the hypothesis that it originates beneath the surface and under high pressure, produced in most cases by earth, but in some instances by a weight of incumbent water. Like surface volcanic rocks it has been fused and afterward cooled; but it does not, like them, comprehend tuffs and breccias, &c., but assumes a crystalline texture, destitute of pores, or cellular cavities to which gases entangled in lava or any such rock give rise. It is in favor of its igneous origin that it has in many places broken through ordinary sedimentary or metamorphic strata, sending veins through them in various directions. It rarely, however, overtops or caps them, as if coming up molten through a crater it had overflowed them above. Hence the term proposed for it—"underlying"—to distinguish it from the volcanic rocks, called "overlying" rocks. Some geologists consider it not an "igneous" or "plutonic," but a metamorphic rock, more altered than gneiss, which agrees with it in composition, but in which stratification has not been obliterated. The two views are not necessarily antagonistic; some granites may have the one origin and others the other. It is of all ages, some granite in the Alps having broken up the strata during Tertiary times. Granite incloses fluid cavities, having in them water, containing chlorides of potassium and sodium, with sulphates of potash, soda, and lime.

2. Chem., &c.: M. Durocher supposes that a mass containing in combustion silica, alumina, alkaline, and earthy bases, potash, soda, sometimes lithia, with a little lime magnesia, the oxides of iron and manganese, with minute quantities of hydrofluoric, and even of boric acid, would, as it cooled, separate into quartz, mica, and felspar, the felspar crystallizing sooner than the quartz, which would long remain in a viscous state.

3. Physical Geog., Scenery, &c.: Granite often constitutes the axis of high mountain chains; the Sinaitic range has an axis of granite. Granite hills have a peculiar rounded form, with a scanty vegetation. They are easily distinguishable from the flat-topped precipice-flanked basaltic hills. Von Buch considers that granitic mountains so much tend to be portions of a sphere, that he looks upon them as ellipsoidal bubbles, which were forced upward only in a partially fluid state; then, when the upper dome-shaped surface contracted, many granitic blocks were formed.

4. Comm., &c.: Granite is of much economic value as a building stone. New Hampshire is popularly called the Granite State, on account of the quantity of granite composing its mountains. [GRANITE-POLISHING.]

B. As adjective:

I. Ord. Lang.: Consisting of or belonging to granite.

"All round the mouth of Eskdale and south in the direction of Bootle, the granite blocks are chiefly congregated."—Quar. Jour. Geol. Soc., x.

II. Fig.: Resembling granite in any of the qualities for which that material is noted.

"So up thy hill, ambrosial Richmond! heaves Dull Maurice all his granite weight of leaves:
Smooth, solid monument of mental pain."
Byron: English Bards and Scotch Reviewers.

granite-dispersing, a.

Geol.: Dispersing granite in the form of erratic blocks.

"The granite-dispersing power of Kirkcudbrightshire."
—Quar. Jour. Geol. Soc., xxxv. 431.

granite-dispersion, s.

Geol.: The act of dispersing or scattering granite in the form of erratic blocks.

"The great Kirkcudbrightshire granite-dispersion."—Quar. Jour. Geol. Soc., xxxv. 431.

granite-group, s.

Petrol.: A group of rocks of which granite is the type, arranged under the class Crystalline Rocks. Rutley includes in it the following species: granite, porphyritic granite, felsstone, granitite, cordierite granite, luxullianite, aplite or haplite, granulite, gneiss, gneiss, protogine, and cornubianite (q. v.).

granite-polishing, s. The polishing of granite. The method of doing this was discovered by MacDonald of Aberdeen, Scotland.

granite-ware, s. A species of ironware, enamelled to resemble granite. It is very largely used in the manufacture of kitchen utensils.

grän'-i-tél, grän'-i-téle, s. [Fr. granitelle.]

Petrol.: A variety of gray granite with small crystalline granules, the components being felspar and quartz. It was worked by the ancient Romans as marble. Graphic granite is a variety of it.

grä-nit'-ic, †grä-nit'-ic-äl, a. [Eng. granit(e); -ic, -ical; French granitique.] Of or pertaining to granite; like granite; of the nature of granite; consisting or composed of granite. (Quar. Jour. Geol. Soc., ix. 264.)

†granitic-aggregate, s.

Petrol.: A granular rock consisting of two or more simple minerals, only one of which is one of the ordinary constituents of granite. Thus there may be rock of quartz and hornblende, or of felspar and schorl.

grä-nit'-i-fi-cä-tion, s. [Eng. granitify; c connective; suffix -ation.] The act of forming into granite; the state or process of becoming formed into granite.

grä-nit'-i-form, a. [Eng. granite, and form.] Having the form of granite; having a granitic structure or shape.

grä-nit'-i-fy, v. t. [English granite; suff. -fy (q. v.).] To form into granite.

*grän'-i-tin, *grän'-i-tine, s. [Fr. granitin.]

Petrol.: A rock consisting of felspar and quartz. Called also Pegmatite (q. v.).

grän'-i-tite, s. [English granite, and suff. -ite (Min.) (q. v.).]

Petrol.: Any variety of granite which contains a certain amount of plagioclase (oligoclase). It has also flesh-red orthoclase, quartz, and a small quantity of blackish-green magnesian mica. (Rutley.)

grän'-i-töld, a. [Eng., &c. granit(e), and suff. -oid; from eidos=form, appearance.]

Petrol.: Resembling granite; having the same mineral composition as granite, or having the minerals of which the rock is composed distinct, as in granite.

"We found it to be only a huge erratic of the usual granitoid gneiss."—Prof. Geikie, in Macmillan's Magazine, Oct., 1881, p. 426.

grän'-i-töld'-ite, s. [Eng. granitoid; -ite.]

Petrol.: A name proposed, in 1879, by Prof. Bonney for certain Dimetian granitoid rocks, which in general aspect much resemble a granite poor in mica; they are metamorphic, elastic rocks, but differ from ordinary gneiss in being scarcely, if at all, foliated, and in the small amount of mica. The word has a plural, granitoidites.

grän'-i-töne, s. [Ital.]

1. Petrol., &c.: The name given in Tuscany to a very dense rock with large crystals of diallage, and milk-white or slightly steel-gray crystals of felspar of the hardest kind, occasionally replaced by steatite. The same as EUPHOTIDE (q. v.).

2. Palæont.: It is of miocene age.

grä-niv-ër-ous, a. [Lat. granum=grain, seed; voro=to devour; and Eng. adj. suff. -ous.] Feeding or living on grain.

"I speak of granivorous birds, such as common fowls, turkeys, ducks, geese, pigeons, &c."—Foley: Natural Theology, ch. xvi.

böil, böy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, ag; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = şan. -tion, -sion = şhün; -tion, -şion = zhün. -tious, -cious, -sious = şhüs. -ble, -die, &c. = bel, del.

*grän-nam, *grän-näm, s. [A corrupt. of grandam (q. v.).] A grandmother.

"Ghosts never walk till after midnight, if I may believe my grannam."
Beaum. & Flét.: Lover's Progress, iv. 1.

grän-ný, grän-niö, s. [GRANNAM.] A grandmother; an old woman.

"I've heard my reverend grannie say,
In lanely glens you like to stray."
Burns: Address to the Deil.

granny's-knot, s.

Naut.: A knot in which the second tie is across, differing from a reef-knot, in which the end and outer part are in line.

grän-ö-lith'-ic, s. A hard artificial stone, extensively used in the construction of sidewalks.

grant, *granti, *grante, *grante, *graunt, *graunte, v. t. & i. [O. Fr. granter, grauter, forms of craunter, creanter=to caution, to assure, from Low Lat. credento*, creanto=to guarantee; credentia=a promise; from Lat. credens, pr. par. of credo=to trust.]

A. Transitive:

1. To bestow, give, or confer, particularly in answer to prayer or request; to concede.

"He is worthy that thou grante to him this thing."
Wycliffe: Luk vii.

2. To admit as true something not yet proved; to allow, to concede.

"I take it for granted . . . in this article it signifies not holy things, but holy ones."
Pearson: On the Creed.

3. To transfer or bestow the right or title to; to convey by deed or writing; to give or make over for any good consideration.

"Grant me the place of this threshing-floor."
1 Chron. xxi. 22.

*4. To agree with; to assent to.

"Us thought it was not worth to make it wise,
And granted him withouten more avise."
Chaucer: C. T., 778.

*5. To admit of, to allow, to permit.

"His heart granteth
No penetrable entrance to her plaining."
Shakespeare: Rape of Lucrece, 558.

B. Intransitive:

1. To allow, to concede, to admit.

"But granting your excellence has at last forced envy to confess that your works have some merit."
Goldsmith: Polite Learning, ch. x.

*2. To consent, to agree.

"Before I would have granted to that act."
Shakespeare: Henry VI., Pt. III., i. 1.

* For the difference between to grant and to give, see GIVE.

grant, s. [GRANT, v.]

*I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of granting, bestowing, or conferring.

*2. Consent, agreement.

"You grant or your denial shall be mine."
Shakespeare: Henry VI., Pt. III., iii. 3.

3. That which is granted, bestowed, or conferred; a gift, a boon; property conveyed by deed or patent.

"All the Irish grants of William were annulled."
Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xxv.

*4. The admission of something not yet proved as true; concession.

"But of this so large a grant, we are content not to take advantage."
Hooker: Eccles. Polity.

II. Law: The conveyance in writing of such things as cannot be passed or conveyed by word only, as lands, reversions, rents, &c., or made by such persons as cannot give but by deed.

"Thus mutual convenience introduced commercial traffic, and the reciprocal transfer of property by sale, grant, or conveyance; which may be considered either as a continuance of the original possession which the first occupant had, or as an abandoning of the thing by the present owner, and an immediate successive occupancy of the same by the new proprietor."
Blackstone: Comment., bk. ii., ch. 1.

*grant'-a-ble, a. [Eng. grant; -able.]

1. That may or can be granted or conveyed by grant.

"Tithe and Church lands . . . coming to the crown became grantable in that way to the subject."
Burke: Dormant Claims of the Church.

2. That may or can be granted, allowed, or conceded.

"The Statute of Clarendon gave the accused of felony or treason, although quitted by the ordeal, forty days to pass out of the realm with his substance, which to other felons taking sanctuary and confessing to the coroner, he affirms not grantable."
Selden: Illustrat. Drayton's Polyolbion, s. 17.

grant-éd, pa. par. or a. [GRANT, v.]

† To take as or for granted: To assume as conceded or allowed; to take as admitted to be true, though not yet proved.

grant-eó, s. [Eng. grant; -ee.]

Law: The person to whom a grant or conveyance is made.

"Some of the living grantees were unpopular."
Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xxiii.

grant-ér, *graunt-er, s. [Eng. grant; -er.] One who grants.

"Both sides being desirers, and neither granters, they broke off the conference."
Sidney: Arcadia, bk. iii.

*grant'-ise, s. [O. Fr.] A grant or granting.

"Asked Henry a bone of granteise of grace."
Robert de Brunne, p. 184.

*grant'-ly, adv. [Eng. grant; -ly.] Willingly; with consent or willingness.

grant-ör, or grant-ör', s. [Eng. grant; -or.]

Law: The person by whom a grant or conveyance is made.

"A duplex querela shall not be granted under pain of suspension for the grantor from the execution of his office."
Ayliffe: Paregon.

grän'-u-lä, s. pl. [Latin granulum, dimin. of granum=a grain.]

Botany:

1. Large sporules contained in the center of many algae, as in the genus Gloionema. (Lindley.)

2. The spore-case of a fungal. (Treas. of Bot.)

grän'-u-lär, a. [Eng. granul(e); -ar.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Composed of or resembling granules or grains.

"The protoplasm comprising them is finely granular throughout."
Quain: Anatomy, ii. 23.

2. Bot.: Divided into little knobs or knots, as the roots of Saxifraga granulata. (Lindley.)

granular crystalline-orthoclase, s.

Min. & Petrol.: A variety of orthoclase. Dana includes under it granite, gneiss, micaschist, syenite, syenitic gneiss, granulite, albitic granite, pyroxenite, and miacscite.

granular-diorite, s.

Petrol.: A variety of diorite in which the individual constituents can be recognized by the naked eye. (Rutley.)

granular-limestone, s.

Petrol.: A metamorphic limestone, composed of small grains or minute crystals intersecting each other in all directions, so as to produce a glimmering luster, though they themselves, taken singly, are brilliant. It is white, gray, yellowish, bluish-gray, reddish, greenish, &c., occasionally veined or spotted. It has no fossils, but at times contains various minerals, such as quartz, garnet, mica, hornblende, talc, actinolite, asbestos, sulphuret of lead and of zinc, &c. Of old it was called also primitive limestone, but it is now known that it may be of any age. It is often called crystalline limestone. Probably it is in all cases indirectly of animal origin. [LIMESTONE.] A variety of it is called statuary-marble (q. v.). (Phillips, &c.) grän'-u-lär-ly, adv. [Eng. granular; -ly.] In a granular manner or form.

*grän'-u-lär-ly, a. [English granul(e); -ary.] Granular; resembling granules or grains; consisting of granules.

"Proportionally mixed, tempered, and formed into granular bodies."
Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. ii., ch. v.

grän'-u-läte, v. t. & i. [Eng. granul(e); -ate; Fr. granuler.]

A. Transitive:

1. To form into granules or small masses.

"Tin and lead may be quickly and better granulated by the mechanical way."
Boyle: Works, iii. 464.

2. To raise granules or small asperities; to make rough on the surface.

"It would be too much to assert that the skin of the dog-fish was made rough and granulated on purpose for the polishing of wood."
Foley: Nat. Theol., ch. v.

B. Intrans.: To be formed into granules or small masses; to become granulated.

"It is a property of granulating substances to adhere promptly and permanently if brought together accurately."
Ashhurst: Encyclopædia of Surgery, i. 114.

grän'-u-läte, grän'-u-lät-éd, pa. par. or a.

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Consisting of or resembling grains or granules; granular.

2. Having numerous small asperities.

II. Bot.: The same as GRANULAR, 2 (q. v.).

granulated-glass, s. A kind of roughened glass, used for stained windows.

granulated-steel, s.

Metall.: Melted pig-iron is scattered by a wheel into a cistern of water, and thus reduced to fragments. These are imbedded in powdered hematite or sparry iron ore, and subjected to furnace heat. The exterior of the fragments become decarbonized and thus reduced to the condition of malleable iron. The metal is made homogeneous by melting, and steel is produced.

grän'-u-lä'-tion, s. [Fr.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of forming into granules or grains.

2. The state or process of becoming granular.

II. Technically:

1. Chem.: Zinc and tin are granulated by pouring the melted metal into cold water; the metal is thus obtained in small fragments. Granulated zinc is used for preparing hydrogen gas, and granulated tin along with concentrated hydrochloric acid is used to reduce nitro compounds to amido compounds.

"Granulation is the process by which metals are reduced to minute grains. It is effected by pouring them in a melted state, through an iron cullender pierced with small holes, into a body of water, or directly upon a bundle of twigs immersed in water. In this way copper is granulated into bean shot, and silver alloys are granulated preparatory to refining."
Ure: Cyclopædia.

2. Surgery:

(1) A process by which little granular or grain-like fleshy bodies are formed on the surfaces of ulcers and suppurating wounds, and serve both for filling up the cavities and bringing closer together and uniting their sides.

"The mode of healing by granulation."
Ashhurst: Encyclopædia of Surgery, i. 112.

(2) The fleshy grain-like bodies thus formed.

"Small conical eminences called granulations . . . in which, by the aid of a pocket lens, minute vessels can be distinguished."
Ashhurst: Encyclopædia of Surgery, i. 113.

grän'-ule, s. & a. [Fr., from Lat. granulum, dimin. of granum=a grain.]

A. As substantive:

1. Gen. (for the most part technically): Any small body like a grain of wheat, oats, &c.; a little grain.

"With an excellent microscope, where the naked eye did see but a green powder, the assisted eye could discern particular granules, some blue, and some yellow."
Boyle: Works, i. 680.

II. Specially:

1. Anat.: There are granules in the blood and in the nerve substance. (See also B. ¶.)

2. Botany:

(1) & (2) [GRANULA.]

(3) Pl. Pollen-grains.

(4) Knobs or knots constituting portions of a root. [GRANULAR.]

3. Petrol.: A minute grain of a simple mineral, as one of the mechanically united constituents of a rock.

"The quartz occurs in small rounded granules in the rock."
Quar. Jour. Geol. Soc., xii. 188.

4. Astron.: [¶ (1), (2).]

B. As adj.: Consisting of granules.

† There is a granule-layer of the cerebellum. It consists of granule-like corpuscles lying in dense groups near the medullary center. (Quain.)

¶ (1) Granules of Huggins:

Astron.: Groups of the granules described under (2).

(2) Granules of Langley:

Astron.: Minute bodies scattered over the whole surface of the sun, and assumed to be the immediate source of solar light and heat.

granule-cells, s. pl.

Anatomy:

1. Gen.: Cells containing globules of fat or oil existing in animal solids or liquids.

2. Spec.: Such cells when of new formation in inflammation, cancer, &c. (Griffith & Henfrey.)

grän'-u-lif-ér-ous, a. [Eng. granule; Lat. fero=to bear, to produce, and Eng. adj. suff. -ous.]

Bearing grains; full of grains.

grän'-u-lif-ör, a. [Eng. granule, and form.]

Petrol. & Min.: Having a granular structure.

grän'-u-lite, grän'-u-lýte, s. [Mod. Lat. granulum, and suff. -ite (Min.) (q. v.).]

Petrol.: A mixture of granular orthoclase and more or less quartz. It is sometimes called semi-granite. It often contains small garnets. Rutley considers it a metamorphic rock. A variety of it is termed Aplite. Granulite is called also Leptinite.

"This granulite or 'semi-granite,' as it is well-called."
Quar. Jour. Geol. Soc., xxxiii. 820.

fäte, fät, färe, amidst, whät, fäll, father; wë, wët, hëre, camel, hër, there; pine, pît, sîre, sîr, marine; gô, pô, or, wöre, wöf, wörk, whô, sôn; müte, cüb, cüre, unite, cür, räde, räll; trý, sýrian. æ, œ = é; ey = ä. qu = kw.

grän-u-löse, s. [Eng., &c., granul(e)-ose.] A name given to the part of the starch granules which is dissolved by dilute acids and acted upon by ferments; the residue is said to consist of a variety of cellulose, insoluble in water, which by long boiling is converted into granulose.

grän-u-lös, a. [Fr. granuleux, from granule; Sp. granuloso; Ital. granuloso.] Full of grains or granules; granular.

gräpe (1), s. [GRAIP (1), s.]

gräpe (2), s. [GRAIP (2), s.]

gräpe (3), gräap*, s. [Fr. grappe=a bunch or cluster of grapes; M. H. Ger. krappe; O. H. Ger. chrappo=a hook; M. H. Ger. kripfen; O. H. Ger. chrappen=to seize, to clutch.]

I. Ordinary Language:

A. As substantive:

Bot., Hort., &c.: The fruit of Vitis vinifera, or that important plant itself. [VITIS.] The native country of the vine is the region round the Caspian Sea, extending through Armenia as far west as the Crimea. It has been cultivated from the remotest antiquity (Gen. ix. 20). It flourishes in Turkey, Greece, Italy, Spain, France, Germany, and this country.

1. Bear's grape is Vaccinium aretostaphylos, also Aretostaphylos uva ursi; the Corinth grape is the Black Corinth variety of Vitis vinifera, the one which furnishes dried currants; the Sea-grape is Ephedra distachya, also Sargassum bacciferum; and the Seaside grape Coccoloba uvifera.

II. Technically:

1. Farr. (pl.): A mangy tumor on the legs of horses.

2. Mil.: [GRAPESHOT.]

3. Ord.: The cascabel or knob at the end of a cannon.

B. As adj.: Of, belonging to, or in any way resembling the fruit described under A or the climbing shrub on which it grows.

grape-bunch, s. A bunch or cluster of grapes.

"Bees like a long grape-bunch settle on Some temple's top."

Holdiday: Juvenal, sat. xiii.

grape-flower, s.

Bot.: Muscari racemosum.

grape-fungus, s.

Bot., &c.: Oidium tuckeri. [VINE-MILDEW.]

grape-hyacinth, s.

Bot.: The genus Muscari.

grape-pear, s.

Bot.: Amelanchier botryapium.

grape-sugar, s. [GLUCOSE.]

grape-trellis, s. A trellis on which grape-vines are trained. [TRELLIS.]

grape-vine, s. The vine which bears grapes. [VINE.]

"She was sporting with her women,

Swinging in a swing of grape-vines."

Longfellow: Song of Hiawatha, iii.

[In this country the word vine is used generically. It is made to signify any plant climbing with tendrils. Thus there is the melon-vine and even the pea-vine. It is, therefore, necessary to have a specific word to distinguish one from the other; hence the use of the term "grape-vine."

gräpe-löss, a. [Eng. grape; -less.] Without grapes; wanting the strength and flavor of the grape.

gräpe-löt, s. [Eng. grape; dimin. suff. -let.] A little grape.

"With its grapelets of gold Growing bright through my fingers."

E. B. Browning: Rhapsody of Life's Progress.

gräp-är-y, s. [Eng. grape; -ry.] A building, inclosure, or other place where grape-vines are cultivated; a vinery.

"A little grapeery and a little aviary."—Miss Edgeworth: Absentee, ch. vi.

gräpe-shöt, s. [Eng. grape, and shot.]

Ordinance: Spherical iron shot, rather less than half the diameter of the bore of the piece for which they are intended, and put up in stands consisting of three tiers of three shot each; the stand has a circular cast-iron plate at top and bottom, connected by a bolt and nut. Grapeshot is now little used. Quilted grape is formed by sewing the shot up in a sort of canvas-bag, which is afterward wrapped around with twine or cord, so as to form meshes; bullets put up in this way were formerly employed for blunderbusses and small artillery. This form has some resemblance to a bunch of grapes, whence the name.

"One of these guns, laden with grapeshot, was now fired at the boats."—Marryat: Peter Simple, ch. xxxiii.

gräpe-stöne, s. [Eng. grape, and stone.] The stone or seed of the grape.

"Nay, in Death's hand, the grapesstone proves

As strong as thunder is in Jove's."

Cowley: Elegy upon Anacreon.

gräpe-wört, s. [Eng. grape, and wort.]

Bot.: The Bane-berry, Actaea spicata.

-graph, suff. [Gr. graphō=to write, to draw.] A suffix largely used in the names of scientific instruments; as, pantograph, seismograph, telegraph, &c., to denote the action of delineation or figuring performed by such instruments.

gräp-ic, gräp-ich*, gräp-ic-al*, a. [Lat. graphicus=pertaining to drawing or painting; Fr. graphikos, from graphō=to write, to draw; Fr. graphique.]

*1. Of or pertaining to the art of writing, delineating, or describing.

*2. Written, drawn, inscribed; well or plainly delineated.

"Writing with a needle, or bodkin, or knife, or the like, when the fruit or trees are young: for as they grow, so the letters will grow more large and graphical."—Bacon: Natural History, § 503.

3. Described with vivid and clear language; vividly or forcibly described.

"Could the prophet have possibly given a plainer or more graphical description?"—Warburton: Divine Legislation, bk. iv., § 6.

4. Having the power or faculty of describing things graphically; as, a graphical writer.

graphic formula, s.

Chem.: Graphic formulæ represent the relations of the atoms contained in a molecule to each other. Thus, the nitro-paraffins contain the same number of atoms of the various elements as are contained in the corresponding nitrous ethers, as CH₃NO is the formula for methyl nitrite and nitromethane, but the graphic formula shows that in nitromethane the nitrogen atom is in direct union with a carbon atom, and in methyl nitrite the nitrogen atom is attached to an oxygen atom. When atoms are united by two affinities it is represented by a double bond, by three affinities by a triple bond, &c.

graphic-gold, graphic-ore, graphic-tellurium, s.

Min.: The same as SYLVANITE (q. v.). The term graphic refers to the arrangement of the crystals in a manner to suggest written characters.

graphic-granite, s.

Petrol.: Granite consisting of felspar (orthoclase), quartz, and a little mica. When a section is made in a particular direction, an appearance is presented as if the stone had been written over with characters bearing a remote resemblance to Hebrew letters.

graphic-microscope, s. A microscope provided with a reflector, which casts down the image upon a piece of paper. The instrument has two reflectors, the second one of which is a prism, across the edge of which the eye observes the image, which may be traced by a pencil.

graphic-ore, s. [GRAPHIC-GOLD.]

graphic representation, s. Representation by means of lines or diagrams.

graphic-tellurium, s. [GRAPHIC-GOLD.]

gräp-ic-al-ly, adv. [Eng. graphical; -ly.] In a graphic manner; with graphic language.

"Those internal throes and frightful agitations so graphically described."—Warburton: Doctrine of Grace, bk. ii., ch. viii.

gräp-ic-ly, adv. [Eng. graphic; -ly.] In a graphic manner; graphically.

gräp-ic-nëss, gräp-ic-al-nëss, s. [Eng. graphic, graphical; -ness.] The quality or state of being graphic.

gräp-i-dä-çë-s, s. pl. [Lat. graphis (genit. graphidis, graphidos), and fem. pl. adj. suff. -acëe.] Bot.: An order proposed by Lindley for those lichens which have the nucleus breaking up into naked spores. The same as GRAPHIDEI (q. v.).

gräp-i-dä-s, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. graph(is), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Bot.: A family of lichens, tribe Idiothalamæe. (Lindley.) It is now elevated into an order Graphidei (q. v.).

grä-phid-ë-i, tgrä-phid-ë-s, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. graphis, genit. graphid(is), and Lat. masc. pl. adj. suff. -ei, or fem. -eæ.]

Bot.: A natural order of lichens, having the disc of the fruit linear, and either simple or branched. In most cases there is a distinct receptacle. The species occur both in temperate and tropical countries. They are sometimes called Letter-lichens.

gräp-i-öl-ë-gy, s. [Gr. graphō=to write, and logos=a discourse, a treatise.] The art of writing or delineating; a treatise on the art of writing.

gräp-ly, s. [Lat. graphis; Gr. graphis=a style for writing, a drawing in outline.]

Bot.: The typical genus of the family Graphidæ, or the order Graphideæ (q. v.).

gräp-ite, s. [Greek graphō=to delineate, to write; suff. -ite (Min.) (q. v.).]

1. Min.: A hexagonal mineral, crystallizing in flat six-sided tables. Hardness, 1-2; specific gravity, 2.1-2.2. Color, iron-black to dark steel gray, with a metallic luster and a black shining streak. Composition: carbon, either pure with an admixture of iron, or occasionally of silica, alumina, and lime. It is popularly called black-lead, though there is no lead even as an impurity in its composition.

2. Comm.: The product is used for the manufacture of pencils.

3. Geol.: Graphite probably arose from considerably altered vegetable or animal remains; in all likelihood the former.

graphite-battery, s.

Elect. Mach.: A galvanic battery consisting of zinc and carbon in sulphuric acid.

grä-phit-ic, a. [English, &c., graphit(e); -ic.] Derived from graphite (q. v.).

graphitic-acid, s.

Chem.: C₁₁H₆O₆. Obtained by mixing one part of powdered graphite with three parts of potassium chlorate, and treating the mixture with concentrated nitric acid, and warming to 60° till no more orange vapors are given off. The residuum is washed with water, dried, and the operation repeated five times. Graphitic-acid is scarcely soluble in water, and forms transparent light-yellow crystals. When heated it gives off gases, and leaves finely divided charcoal. It forms compounds with bases.

gräp-i-töld, gräp-i-töld-al, a. [English graphite, and Gr. eidos=appearance.] Having the appearance of graphite.

gräp-ö-lite, s. [Greek graphō=to write, and lithos=stone; Fr. grapholite.]

grappling-iron, s. An iron instrument made with four or more claws or hooks for laying hold on anything.

grāp'-sī-dæ, s. pl. [Lat. graps(us), and fem. pl. adj. suff. -ide.]

Zool.: Grapsoidians; a family of brachyurous crustaceans, tribe Catamnetopes. Milne Edwards places them between the Gonoplians and the Oxytomies. They have a less regularly quadrilateral carapace than in the Gonoplians, to which they are closely akin. They are inhabitants of the sea-shore or of rocks bordering the ocean. They are timid, and escape with much speed at the first appearance of danger.

grāp'-sīd-i-ans, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. grapsus; Gr. eidos=form, appearance, and Eng. pl. suff. -ans.]

Zool.: The English name of the family Grapsidae (q. v.).

grāp'-sūs, s. [Gr. grapsaios=a crab.]

1. Zool.: The typical genus of the family Grapsidae (q. v.). The genus was founded by Lamarck, but its limits have been narrowed by Milne Edwards, who confines it to species with their body greatly flattened. They are widely distributed.

2. Paleont.: Grapsus is found in the Tertiary strata.

grāp'-tō-lite, s. [GRAPTOLITES.]

Paleont.: The English name of any animal of the sub-class Graptolite, and specially of the typical genus Graptolites (q. v.).

1. Double graptolites.

Zool.: Diplograpsus, didymograpsus, &c.

2. Twin graptolites.

Zool.: Didymograpsus. [GRAPTOLITE.]

graptolite-schists, graptolitic-schists, s. pl. Geol.: Schists of Lower Silurian age containing graptolites with their slope as a rule E. N. E. and W. S. W.

grāp'-tō-lī-tēs, *grāp'-tō-līth-ūs, s. [Greek graptos=painted, marked with letters, written, and lithos=stone.]

Paleontology: 1. (Of the form graptolithus): A genus belonging to the mineral kingdom, instituted by Linnaeus, and placed by him in his class Fossilia and his order Petrificata. He defines it as a petrification resembling a picture. It is quite a medley. One species resembles a map; a second is variegated Florentine marble; another looks like a fossil alga; a fourth is a recent serpulæ on oysters and other shells; and a fifth dendritic markings on agates. None of these are graptolites in the modern sense. 2. (Of the form graptolites): The typical genus of the sub-class (formerly the family) Graptolitidae. Only one side has a row of cellules.

grāp'-tō-līth-ūs, s. [GRAPTOLITES.] grāp'-tō-līth-ic, a. [Mod. Lat. graptolit(es), and Eng. &c., suff. -ic.]

Paleont.: Of, belonging, relating to, or containing graptolites.

graptolitic-schists, subst. pl. [GRAPTOLITE-SCHISTS.]

grāp'-tō-līth-ic, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. graptolit(es), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -ide.]

Paleont.: A sub-class (formerly a family) of Hydrozoa. They have a compound hydrosoma, occasionally branched, consisting of numerous polypites protected by hydrothecæ, and united by a consarc inclosed in a strong tubular polypary. Their nearest living allies are the Sertularida. Some have a row of cellules only on one, and others on both, sides. They are characteristic Silurian fossils. They occurred where the sea-bed was of mud. Prof. Allman calls the sub-class which they constitute Rhabdopleura. Genera Graptolites and Rastrites, with rows of cellules only on one side, the former coiled like a watch-spring, Diplograpsus, Didymograpsus, &c., with two rows, the cellules in the latter turned to, and in the former away from, each other.

*grāp'-y, a. [Eng. grap(e); -y.] Consisting of or resembling grapes.

"The grape clusters spread."
Addison: Ovid; Metam., iii.

grasp, *graaap, *graspe, *grasp-en, v. t. & i. [From grapsen, an extension of grapen = to grope; cf. Ger. grapsen = to snatch; Ital. graspere = to grasp.]

"Some one that would with grace be gratified."

Spenser: Muiopotmos, 110.

*5. To grant or allow for the sake of pleasing.

"You steer between the country and the court, Nor gratify whate'er the great desire."

Dryden: To John Dryden, 129.

*6. To reward, to requite, to recompense.

"To gratify his noble service."

Shakesp.: Coriolanus, ii. 2.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between to gratify, to indulge, and to humor: "To gratify is a positive act of the choice. To indulge is a negative act of the will, a yielding of the mind to circumstances. One gratifies the appetites; one indulges the humors. To gratify and indulge, as individual acts, may be both allowable; but to gratify is unrestricted by any moral consideration; indulging always involves the sacrifice of some general rule of conduct or principle of action. We may sometimes gratify a laudable curiosity, and indulge ourselves by a salutary recreation; but gratifying as a habit becomes a vice, and indulging as a habit is a weakness. To humor is to indulge or fall in with the humor; it may be selfish or prudent. A good parent indulges his child in whatever he knows is not hurtful; it is sometimes necessary to humor the temper in some measure, the better to correct it. Things gratify; persons only indulge." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

1. Ord. Lang.: One who digs graves.

2. Entom.: The name given in Jamaica to a fossorial insect of the order Hymenoptera, family Sphegidae, which digs holes in clay, in which it lays its eggs, depositing along with them, for the future sustenance of its larvæ, caterpillars and spiders slightly stung, so as to leave them half dead. Its allies everywhere pursue essentially the same method of operation.

grave-maker, graf-makere, subst. A grave-digger.

"Gardeners, ditchers, and grave-makers,"—Shakespeare: Hamlet, v. 1.

grave-making, s. The act or occupation of digging graves.

"Has this fellow no feeling of his business? he sings at grave-making,"—Shakespeare: Hamlet, v. 1.

grave-man, s. A sexton, a grave-digger.

Anthrop.: Extensive mounds occur in various portions of North America, especially in the Ohio and Mississippi valleys, in which aboriginal remains, flint arrow-heads, and pottery are found. These mounds are supposed to have been formed by a race who preceded the Indians in their occupancy of this country, and who are now distinguished only by the indefinite name of Mound Builders. The generic term for what is probably the earliest, and certainly the most widely-distributed, form of funeral monument. Mr. Greenwell in British Barrows (Introd.), p. i., pertinently applies to the grave-mound the words of Horace, "monumentum ære perennius;" how pertinently may be perceived by a mental glance at the grave-mounds that spread like a covering over the steppes of Western Asia, and at the pyramids, the sepulchers of the early Egyptian kings. The facility with which the savage could heap a mound of earth over the remains of his dead commended this form of commemoration to his little-developed mind, and to this day such sepulture is common among certain tribes of American Indians; on the other hand, as civilization advanced, its durability—whether in the form of an artificial hill or a stupendous pyramid—was recognized and seized on by those who wished to raise a monument besetting a hero, or to perpetuate their own memory. In British barrows flints and broken pottery are found scattered in such a way as to preclude the idea of accident. Greenwell suggests that they symbolized some religious idea, and adds that the lines in Hamlet (v. 1)—

"For charitable prayers, Shards, flints, and pebbles should be thrown on her"— may have reference thereto. He accounts for the rite being practiced at the grave of a suicide denoted Christian burial, by the supposition that, as a survival of paganism, it was held in detestation by the professors of a higher form of religion. [BARROW, CAIRN, PYRAMID, TUMULUS.]

"If people passing by the spot called out to her, 'Mussalama!' she would reply 'Ho!' as the Norse heroes used to speak from their grave-mounds."—Jour. Anthropol. Instit., xi. 417.

Anthrop.: A board fixed at the head of the graves of many Indian tribes. It usually contains the totem of the deceased, and should the tomb be that of a warrior, devices denoting how often he had been in war parties and the number of scalps he had taken.

"On looking at his grave-post, it bore a pictorial inscription of this kind."—Schoolcraft: Indian Tribes, i. 388.

grave-robber, s. One who steals dead bodies from graves; a resurrectionist (q. v.).

grave-robbing, s. The act of robbing a grave; body-snatching.

grave-stone, s. A stone or slab laid over or erected near a grave, on which are written or cut the name, age, &c., of the person there buried; a tombstone.

"Timon, presently prepare thy grave:
Lie where the light foam of the sea may beat Thy grave-stone daily." Shakespeare: Timon, iv. 3.

†grave-wax, s. Adipocere (q. v.).

grave-yard, s. An inclosed ground in which the dead are buried; a burial-ground; a cemetery.

gráve, a. [Fr. from Lat. gravis=heavy; grave; cogn. with Goth. kavars=heavy; Gr. barus; Sansc. guru; Sp. & Ital. grave.]

I. Ordinary Language:

*1. Lit.: Heavy; of weight.

"His shield grave and great."—Chapman.

2. Figuratively:

(1) Weighty; serious; important; momentous.

"Gordon, however, positively refused to take on himself so grave a responsibility."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiii.

(2) Important; of weight, credible.

4. Serious; heavy; as, a grave charge.

*5. Plain; staid; sedate; not gaudy; quiet; as, a grave dress.

6. Not sharp of sound; not acute. [ACCENT.]

"The acute accent raising the voice . . . and the grave depressing it lower, and both having some emphasis—i. e., more vigorous pronunciation."—Holder.

II. Music:

1. Deep in pitch; as, grave hexachord, the lowest hexachord in the Guidonian system.

2. Slow in pace; solemnly.

† Crabb thus discriminates between grave, serious, and solemn: "Grave expresses more than serious; it does not merely bespeak the absence of mirth, but that heaviness of mind which is displayed in all the movements of the body. A man may be grave in his walk, in his tone, in his gesture, in his looks, and all his exterior; he is serious only in his general air, his countenance, and demeanor. Solemn expresses more than either grave or serious; like serious, it is employed not so much to characterize either the person or the thing: the judge pronounces the solemn sentence of condemnation in a solemn manner; a preacher delivers many solemn warnings to his hearers." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

gráve (2), v. t. [GRAVE, a.]

Music.: To render grave, as a note or tone.

gräv'-el, gráve-elle, grá-vylle, s. [O. Fr. gravele, gravelle; Fr. gravelle, gravier, dimin. of O. Fr. grave, grave=rough and mixed with stones. Prob. from the same root as Bret. grouan; Corn. grow; Wel. gro=gravel; Gael. grothlach=gravelly; Sansc. grávan=a stone.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Small pebbles, stones, or fragments of stone, intermixed with sand, loam, clay, flints, &c.

"Gravel consists of flints of all the usual sizes and colors, of the several sorts of pebbles; sometimes with a few pyrites, and other mineral bodies, confusedly intermixed, and common sand."—Woodward.

II. Technically:

1. Geol.: Gravel is formed by the action of water upon disintegrated portions of rock, which tend to be first blocks or bowlders, then pebbles, next gravel, and finally sand, if not even silt. The fragments of which it is composed vary from the size of a pea to that of a hen's egg.

2. Pathol.: The presence of minute concretions in the urine constitutes the affection known as the gravel. It is usually owing to the presence of uric acid, urates, oxalates, and phosphates. Among exceptional urinary calculi are carbonate of lime, cystine, xanthine, fatty and fibrinous concretions. The chief symptoms are dull, aching pains over the renal regions, extending to the thighs, frequent micturition, and the occasional appearance in the urine of blood, pus, epithelium, or unorganized sediments, chiefly uric acid and oxalates.

"Most physicians doo highly commend their roots [asparagus] bruised and taken in white wine, for to expell the stone and gravell."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. xx., ch. x.

gravel-path, gravel-walk, s. A path or alley covered with gravel; a graveled path.

"My garden was laid out in gravel-walks, intersecting each other in right angles."—Knox: Essays, No. 75.

gravel-pit, s. A pit or excavation out of which gravel is dug.

"He saw Mr. Such-a-one go this morning at nine o'clock toward the gravel-pits."—Steele: Spectator, No. 138.

gravel-root, s.

"His sables and his weeds Importing health and graveness."

Shakesp.: Hamlet, iv. 7.

grā-vē-ō-lēnce, s. [Lat. graveolentia, from graveolens=smelling strongly (q. v.); Fr. graveolence.] A strong and offensive smell.

grā-vē-ō-lēnt, a. [Lat. graveolens, from gravis=heavy, and olens, pr. par. of oleo=to smell.] Smelling strongly and offensively; stinking.

"The butter was yellow, and something graveolent."—Boyle: Works, iv. 588.

grāv-ēr, *grā-fer, *grā-fero, *grāv-owre, s. [A. S. græfer; Fr. graveur.]

1. One who carves or engraves; one whose business is to carve or engrave upon wood, stone, metal, &c.; an engraver, a sculptor.

"Just like a marble statue did he stand, Cut by some skillful graver's artful hand."

Cowley: Pyramus and Thisbe; The Song.

2. The tool or style used in graving. They are made of different shapes, according to the purpose intended, and are of fine steel; a burin.

3. An instrument used for turning iron after it has been roughed out by the heel-tool.

grāv-ēr-y, s. [Eng. graver; -y.] The process or art of graving; engraving, engraving.

"Any piece of picture, or gravery and embossing."—P. Holland.

grāves, s. pl. [GRAVES (2).]

grāv-ic, a. [Eng. grav(ity); -ic.] Pertaining to or causing gravitation; as, gravic forces, gravic attraction.

grāv-id, a. [Lat. gravidus, from gravis=heavy.] Big or heavy with child; pregnant; fruitful. (Lit. & fig.)

"The gracious king
To ease and crown their gravid piety, Grants their request."

Beaumont: Psyche, c. xv.

grāv-i-dāte, v. t. [Lat. gravidatus, pa. par. of gravid=to load, to impregnate; gravidus=loaded, pregnant.] To cause to become gravid or big with child.

"Her womb is said to bear him (blessed is the womb that bare thee), to have been gravidated or great with child."—Barrow: Sermons, vol. ii., ser. 24.

grāv-i-dā-tion, s. [Lat. gravidatus, pa. par. of gravid.] The act of making pregnant; the state of becoming or being pregnant; pregnancy.

grā-vid-i-tŷ, s. [Lat. gravidus=loaded, pregnant.] The state of being pregnant; pregnancy.

"The signs of gravidity and obstructions are hard to be distinguished in the beginning."—Arbuthnot: On Diet.

grā-vif-ic, a. [Latin gravis=heavy, and facio=to make.] Making heavy; adding or giving weight to.

grāv-i-grā-da, s. pl. [Lat. gravis=heavy, and gradus=a step; gradior=to take steps, to walk.]

Palæont.: Ground-sloths; a tribe or family of edentate mammals, now extinct. The name is modeled on Tardigrada, sometimes used for the Brady-podidae, or ordinary sloths, to which the Gravigrada were akin. Besides other differences, they were much larger. The tribe or family comprised the huge Megatherium, the Myiodon, the Megalonyx, &c. (q. v.). All are American, and of Post-pliocene age.

grāv-i-grāde, a. [GRAVIGRADA.]

Palæont.: Walking heavily; of or belonging to the edentate tribe or family Gravigrada (q. v.).

grā-vil-ō-quēce, s. [Latin gravis=heavy, grave, and loquens, pr. par. of loquor=to speak.] Grave or weighty speech or language.

grā-vim-ē-tēr, s. [Lat. gravis=heavy; Greek metron=a measure.] An instrument for determining the specific gravities of bodies, solid or liquid.

grāv-i-mēt-ric, a. [Eng. gravimetric(y); -ic.] Of or pertaining to gravimetry; determined or ascertained by a gravimeter.

gravimetric-analysis, s.

Chem.: The method of analyzing compound bodies, performed by decomposing them and finding their elemental weight.

grā-vim-ē-trŷ, s. [Lat. gravis=heavy, and Gr. metron=a measure.] The art or science of determining the specific gravity of bodies.

grāv-ing, pa. par., a. & s. [GRAVE (2), v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb).

C. As substantive:

I. Literally:

1. The act or art of engraving or carving wood, stone, metals, &c.

"He [Holbein] learned besides, graving, casting, modeling, and architecture."—Walpole: Anecdotes of Painting, vol. i., ch. iv.

2. That which is carved or engraved; carved work.

"Skillful to work in gold; . . . also to grave any manner of graving."—2 Chronicles, ii. 14.

II. Fig.: Anything impressed deeply upon the heart or mind.

"For new gravings upon their souls."—King Charles: Eikon Basilike.

grāv-ing, s. [GRAVE (1), v.] Cleaning a ship's bottom by burning off the sea-weed, and then paying the planks with pitch. Ships were formerly beached for this purpose, and the work was done during the time of the ebb. It is also called beaming (q. v.).

"At work on the outside of the ship's bottom and side, washing, and graving, and stopping, as every seafaring man knows how."—Defoe: Robinson Crusoe, pt. ii.

graving-dock, s. A dock into which vessels are floated to have their bottoms examined and cleaned; a dry-dock. The vessel is floated in and the gates at the entrance closed when the tide is at ebb.

graving-piece, s.

Shipbuild.: A small piece of wood inserted to supply the defects of a plank.

grā-vi-tā, adv. [Ital.]

Mus.: With weight, dignity, and majesty.

grāv-i-tāte, v. i. [Latin gravitatio, accus. of gravitas=weight, gravity; Fr. graviter.]

1. Lit.: To be affected by or under the influence of gravitation; to move by gravitation; to tend to the center.

"All its parts magnetic power assert,
And to each other gravitate."

Blackmore: Creation, bk. ii.

2. Fig.: To tend toward any center of attraction; to be attracted.

"A multitude of those mean and timid politicians who naturally gravitate toward the stronger party."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiii.

grāv-i-tā-tion, s [Eng. gravitate(e); -ion; Fr. gravitation.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: In the same sense as II. 1.

"When the loose mountain trembles from on high, Shall gravitation cease, if you go by?"

Pope: Essay on Man, iv. 128.

2. Figuratively:

(1) Attraction produced not by a physical, but by some moral force.

(2) Downward tendency in the literary world.

"With all the might of gravitation blest."

Pope: Dunciad, ii. 318.

II. Physics: A natural force acting upon all material bodies throughout the universe, with the effect of attracting or drawing them to each other. Hence it is often called the attraction of gravitation. It has been shown that every molecule of one body acts upon every molecule of the other. The attraction between two material particles is directly proportional to the product of their masses, and inversely proportional to the square of their distances asunder—i. e., the force of gravity decreases in exact proportion as the square of the distances increases. Universal or general gravitation may be divided into celestial and terrestrial gravitation; but when the earth is viewed as a planet the second category disappears in the first.

1. Celestial gravitation:

(1) Hist.: A glimmering perception that the heavenly bodies attracted each other was possessed by Democritus and Epicurus in ancient times, and by Bacon, Galileo, Kepler, and Hooke during the dawn of modern science; but the decisive discovery of the universality of gravitation and the "law" regulating the operations was reserved for Sir Isaac Newton. Cavendish illustrated Newton's discovery by experiment.

(2) Gravitation among the heavenly bodies: Two forces operate against each other, the one a projectile and the other an attractive force. If the former only existed, the several planets would go off into space, moving, unless collision with other bodies occurred, in straight lines onward forever, unless, indeed, some subtle ether gradually retarded their progress and ultimately brought them to a state of rest. If gravity alone operated, the planets would fall toward the center of the sun with continually increasing velocity, till they impinged upon his surface with destructive effect. The working against each other of the two antagonistic forces makes them move around the central luminary in elliptic orbits, the motion being so beautifully adjusted that when the planet is nearest the sun and apparently in danger of becoming too powerfully under his attraction, the increased velocity thus acquired carries the body past the danger. Not merely does the sun attract the planets, but the planets attract the sun. Properly speaking, they do not revolve around him, but he and they mutually revolve round the common center of gravity of them all, which is a point (not the center) within the body of the sun. The same laws operate in the case of the planets with each other, the primary bodies with their satellites, &c.—i. e., they attract each other directly as their respective masses, and inversely as the square of their distances.

2. Terrestrial gravitation: The law of gravitation as operating on the earth, as, for instance, on the fall of a stone to the ground. [GRAVITY.]

† Law of gravitation: [GRAVITATION, II.]

gravitation-measure, s.

Physics: (For def. see example.)

"Force is said to be expressed in gravitation-measure, when it is expressed as equal to the weight of a given mass."—Everett: The C. G. S. System of Units, ch. iii., p. 13.

grāv-i-tā-tive, a. [English gravitate(e); -ive.] Causing to gravitate, or tend toward a center.

grāv-i-tŷ, *grāv-i-tee, *grāv-i-tie, s. [Fr. gravité; from Lat. gravitas=weight, gravity; gravis=heavy: Ital. gravità; Sp. gravedad.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The quality or state of being heavy; weight, heaviness.

"A thing of that weight and gravité, that it waith some soles downe vnto the deepe pyt of hell."—Sir I. More: Works, p. 1,085.

2. Weight or importance; seriousness.

"Length therefore is a thing which the gravité and weight of such actions [prayer] doth require."—Hooker: Ecclesiastical Polity, bk. v.

3. Seriousness, enormity, flagrancy, atrociousness; as, the gravity of the offense.

4. Graveness, soberness, seriousness, or dignity of demeanor.

"Such ill-timed gravity, such serious folly, Might well befit the solitary student."

Johnson: Irene, iii. 1.

II. Technically:

1. Mus.: Lowness or depth of tone or note.

2. Physics: Terrestrial gravitation, the operation of the law of gravitation on the earth, specially in making heavy bodies fall in all parts of the planet in the direction of its center. Newton and Bessel have shown that in a vacuum a sovereign and a feather will fall with equal speed, though the rate will be very different in the atmospheric air. The attraction of the whole earth, considered as a sphere, on a body at its surface, is the same as if the whole matter of the earth were collected at its center. The attraction of the earth on a body within its surface is the same as if the spherical shell situated between the body and the earth's surface was removed; or is the same as if all the matter situated nearer to the earth's surface than the body was collected at the center, and all the matter situated at a greater distance was removed. The weight of a body is proportioned to the attraction which it exerts, hence gravity in many cases means simply weight. [Specific gravity.]

† (1) Center of gravity: [CENTER, III. (21).]

(2) Specific gravity:

Physics Min., &c.: The relative density of a substance; the weight of a body compared with that of another body having the same magnitude. To obtain this, it is first weighed in air, which shows its absolute weight. Next it is weighed in water, to show how much it loses in this element. There have now been ascertained the absolute weights of two bodies of equal bulk—viz., the one experimented on, and water, and the ratio of these weights is that also of their specific gravities. Let 1 be the weight of water, and first let the body be heavier than that liquid, then the weight which it loses in water is to the absolute weight as 1 to the specific gravity required. If lighter than water, then as the weight of the body in air, plus the weight needful to make it sink in water, is to its weight in air, so is 1 to the specific gravity. On this principle are constructed such instruments as Nicholson's portable balance. In solids and liquids the standard is generally distilled water; for the gases, atmospheric air. Specific gravity is proportionate to density, and the words may be used almost interchangeably. [DENSITY.]

gravity-battery, s. A form of double-fluid battery, in which the fluids range themselves at different heights in a single jar by virtue of their different specific gravities. The copper or — element is in the bottom, and the zinc or + in the upper part of the cell.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sire, sir, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wolf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mātē, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu - kw.

*grāv'-ōūs, a. [Lat. gravis=heavy, grave.]

1. Grave, serious, sage, thoughtful, weighty.
2. Grave, important, serious, momentous.

*grāv'-ōūs-lý, adv. [Eng. gravous; -ly.] In a grave, serious, or thoughtful manner; gravely.

*grāv'-owre, s. [GRAVER.]

grā'-vŷ, *grea-vŷ, *grea-vie, s. [Etym. doubtful; probably formed from grates (q. v.).] The juice which drops from meat while roasting, made into a dressing for the meat when served up.

"I have been invited to a pawnbroker's table, by pretending to hate gravy."—Goldsmith: Citizen of the World, let. 26.

grā-wa'-thā, s. [A Brazilian word.]

Bot.: A kind of Bromelia used in South America for the manufacture of ropes. Called also Curra-tow.

grāy, grey, *grā, *grai, *graye, *grei, *greye, a. & s. [A. S. græg; cogn. with Dut. grauw; Icel. grár; Dan. graa; Sw. gre; Ger. grau; Lat. ravus; O. H. Ger. grāv.]

A. As adjective:

1. Literally:

1. Of a color between white and black; hoary; of the color of hair whitened by age; ashy-colored.

"These gray and dun colors may also be produced by mixing whites and blacks."—Newton: Optics.

2. Having hair whitened by age; gray-haired.

"Living creatures generally do change their hair with age, turning to be gray."—Bacon: Natural History.

3. Whitened or made hoary by age.

"My hair is gray, but not with years."—Byron: Prisoner of Chillon.

4. Dusky, dark.

"Gray dawn appears, the sportsman and his train Speckle the bosom of the distant plain."—Cooper: Progress of Error, 82.

*II. Fig.: Old, mature; as, gray experience.

B. As substantive:

1. Ordinary Language:

1. A gray color; a color between white and black; a neutral tint.

*2. A gray-beard; an old, gray-headed man.

"Telling his tale away this old gray."—Chaucer: Troilus, bk. iv.

*3. A kind of fur.

*4. A badger.

"The grays, polecats, or brooks, have a cast by themselves, when they be afraid of hunters."—P. Holland: Plinte, bk. viii., ch. xxxviii.

5. A kind of salmon (Salmo erox).

¶ The gray of the morning: The dawn.

II. Technically:

1. Bot.: A genus of colors; the species are ash-gray, ash-grayish, pearl gray, slate gray, lead-colored, smoky, mouse-colored, hoary, and rather hoary. (Lindley.)

2. Entom.: A moth, Dianthæcia cæsia. (Newman.)

¶ Obvious compounds: Gray-eyed, gray-headed, gray-haired, &c.

gray-antimony, s.

Min.: The same as STIBNITE (q. v.).

gray-beard, s. & a.

A. As substantive:

1. A man with a gray beard; an old man (frequently in contempt).

"Then said the Lord: This glass to praise Fill with red wine from Portugal!
The gray-beard with trembling hand obeys."—Longfellow: Luck of Edenhall.

2. The name given to a large earthen jar, or bottle, for holding wine or spirituous liquor. Originally applied to a kind of stoneware drinking jugs, with bearded faces on them in relief, introduced in the early part of the sixteenth century.

"There's plenty o' brandy in the gray-beard that Luckie Maclearie sent down."—Scott: Waverley, ch. lxiv.

B. As adj.: Having a gray beard; gray-bearded; old.

gray-bird, s. A species of thrush.

gray-bread, s. Bread made of rye or oats.

gray-carpet, s.

Entom.: Aleucis pictaria, a British moth of the group Geometrina and the family Caberidæ.

gray cast-iron, s.

Metal.: Gray cast-iron contains carbon chemically combined, and also graphite in a free state. When gray cast-iron is treated with an acid, the graphite separates out in black scales.

gray-cobalt, s.

Min.: The same as SMALTITE (q. v.).

gray copper-ore, s.

Min.: The same as TETRAHEDRITE (q. v.).

gray-cotton, s.

Comm.: Unbleached and undyed cotton cloth.

gray-duck, s.

Zool.: The female mallard; the gadwell.

gray-fibers, s. pl.

Anat.: Pale gray fibers found with or without white ones in the sympathetic or other nerves. They were first discovered by Remak, and are often called after his name. (Quain.)

gray-fly, s. [GRAYFLY.]

gray-friars, grey-friars, s. The Franciscans (q. v.).

gray-geese, s. pl. A name vulgarly given to large field stones, lying on the surface of the ground.

"Biggin a dry-stane dyke, I think, wi' the grey-geese, as they ca' theae great loose stones."—Scott: Black Dwarf, ch. iv.

gray-goods, s. [GRAY-COTTON.]

gray-heads, s. pl. Heads of gray-colored oats, growing among others that are not. (Gall: Encyc.) gray-hen, s. The female of the black-cock.

*gray-hooded, a. Gray; dusky.

"They left me, then, when the gray-hooded even, Rose from the hindmost wheels of Phæbus' wain."—Milton: Comus, 188.

gray-malkin, s. [GRIMALKIN.]

gray-mare, grey-mare, s. A cant term for a wife; from the proverb "The gray-mare is the better horse," that is the wife is master.

"The vulgar proverb, that the grey-mare is the better horse, originated, I suspect, in the preference generally given to the grey-mares of Flanders over the finest coach horses of England."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. iii.

gray-owl, grey-owl, s.

Ornith.: The same as the tawny owl, Syrnium stridula.

gray-peas, s. pl. Common peas in a dried state.

*gray, v. i. & t. [GRAY, s.]

A. Intrans.: To become gray or white.

"All grays the gres, that grene watz ere."—Gawaine, 526.

B. Trans.: To make gray.

"Thou hast gray'd a thousand."—Shirley: Bird in a Cage, v.

grāy'-bäck, s. [Eng. gray, and back.]

Zoology:

1. A large whale, plentiful off the coast of California.

2. The body louse.

3. The redbreasted sandpiper.

grāy'-flŷ, s. [Eng. gray, and fly.]

Entom.: A species of Cestrus, called also the trumpet-fly (q. v.).

"What time the grayfly winds her sultry horn."—Milton: Lycidas, 28.

grāy'-hōund, s. [GREYHOUND.]

grāy'-ish, grey'-ish, *grā'-ish, a. [Eng. gray, gray; -ish.] Somewhat gray in color.

"A globc-like head, a gold-like hair,
A forehead smooth and hie,
On either side did shine a gratch eie."—Warner: Albions England, bk. iv., ch. 20.

grāy'-lāg, grāy'-lāgg, s. [Eng. gray, second element doubtful; cf. A. S. laga=water, the sea, a lake, or Ital. lago=a lake.]

Ornith.: Anser ferus, believed to be the origin of the domestic goose.

grāyle, s. [GRAIL.]

grāy'-līng, a. & s. [English gray; dimin. suff. -ling.]

A. As adj.: Of a dull brown or gray color. (See the compound.)

B. As substantive:

1. Ichthy.: A fresh-water fish, Thymallus vulgaris, one of the Salmonidæ. It is common in several streams in Michigan.

2. Entom.: [GRAYLING-BUTTERFLY.]

grayling-butterfly, s.

Entom.: A butterfly, Hipparchia or Satyrus semele. Its general color is dull brown above, fulvous beneath, with dark spots.

grāy'-lŷ, grēy'-lŷ, adv. [Eng. gray, grey; -ly.] In a gray color; with a gray tinge. (Keats: Endymion, i. 231.)

grāy'-mill, grāy'-mīl-lēt, s. [GROMWELL.]

grāy'-nēss, grēy'-nēss, s. [Eng. gray, grey; -ness.] The quality or state of being gray.

grāy'-stōne, s. [GREYSTONE.]

grāy'-wäck-ŝ, s. [GREYWACK.]

grāy'-wēth-ēr, s. [GREYWETHER.]

grāze (1), *grāze, v. t. & i. [Etym. doubtful. According to Skeat coined from rase=to scrape slightly, with some confusion with grate, v.; according to others connected with graze (2). Cf. graze (2), A. II.]

A. Trans.: To touch or rub slightly in passing; to brush the surface lightly.

"It merely tore his coat, grazed his shoulder, and drew two or three ounces of blood."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xvi.

B. Intrans.: To touch lightly in passing; to brush.

"Mark then a bounding valor in our English,
That being dead, like to the bullets grazing, Breaks out."—Shakesp.: Henry V., iv. 3.

grāze (2), *gras-en, *gres-yn, v. i. & t. [From grass (q. v.). O. H. Ger. gagrasōn; M. H. Ger. grasen; Dut. grazen; Ger. grasen.]

A. Intransitive:

1. Literally:

1. To eat grass; to feed on grass or growing herbage.

"The greatest of my pride is to see my ewes graze, and my lambs suck."—Shakesp.: As You Like It, iii. 2.

2. To supply or furnish grass for grazing.

"The ground continueth the wet, whereby it will never graze to purpose that year."—Bacon.

*3. To feed in any way; to browse.

"Grazing at large in meadows submarine."
Cooper: To the Memory of the Halibut.

*II. Fig.: To move along devouring, as spreading fire.

"As every state lay next to the other that was oppressed, so the fire perpetually grazed."—Bacon.

B. Transitive:

1. To supply with grass or pasture; to find pasture for.

"They feede and graze theyr cattle wandering through the deserts and wyld forests."—Goldyng: Justine, bk. i.

*2. To tend while grazing.

"Jacob grazed his uncle Laban's sheep."
Shakesp.: Merchant of Venice, i. 3.

*3. To feed on; to eat, as growing herbage; to browse.

"He gave my kine to graze the flowery plain."
Dryden: Virgil; Ecl. l. 11.

grāze (1), s. [GRAZE (1), v.]

1. The act of grazing or touching lightly; a light or slight touch or rub in passing.

2. A slight mark or cut made by an object touching in passing.

grāze (2), s. [GRAZE (2), v.] The act of grazing or feeding upon grass.

grāz'-ēr, s. [Eng. graze (2); -er.]

1. Ord. Lang.: An animal that grazes or feeds on grass.

2. Ch. Hist.: The rendering of the Greek word Boskoi=herdsmen, given by Sozomen as the name of an order of monks which arose in the fifth century in Mesopotamia, and spread to Palestine. They are said to have fed on herbs, and gone about almost in a state of nudity. (Townsend.)

grā'-zier (zier as zhūr), *gras-ier, s. [Eng. graze (2); -er.] One who grazes or pastures cattle; one who raises and deals in cattle.

"The inhabitants be rather for the most parte graziers then ploughmen."—Stowe: Description of England, p. 2.

*grā'-zier-lŷ (zier as zhūr), adv. [Eng. grazier; -ly.] Relating to or like a grazer.

grāz'-līng (1), *grās'-līng, pr. par., adj. & subst. [GRAZE (1), v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of touching or rubbing lightly in passing; a graze.

"With the grazing of a bullet upon the face of one."—Ludlow: Memoirs, i. 61.

grazing-angle, s.

Fort.: The angle, of 10° or less, of a glacis, at which a shot will not penetrate, but will glance from the surface.

grazing-fire, s.

Fort.: A fire when the trajectory is low, and the projectile strikes the object, whether vertical or horizontal, at a grazing angle. Used in howitzer batteries in the third parallel, to enfilade the covered way; ricochet fire.

grāz'-līng (2), pr. par., a. & s. [GRAZE (2), v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As substantive:

1. The act of feeding on grass or growing herbage.

2. A pasture, a grazing-ground.

gra-zì-ô-sô (z as ts), adv. [Ital.]

Mus.: A sign or direction that the notes or passage to which it is prefixed must be played with grace and elegance.

grê, *grêe, s. [O. Fr. gret, gre; Fr. gré, from Lat. gratum, neut. sing. of gratus=pleasing; Ital. grato.] That which is pleasing; will, pleasure, satisfaction.

"Lene me thy grace, for to go at thi gre."

E. Eng. Allit. Poems; Patience, 347.

grê-a-ble, a. [Mid. Eng. gre; -able.] Agreeable, willing, ready.

grêase, *grece, *grese, *grees, *gresse, subst. [O. Fr. grese, graisse; Fr. graisse, from O. Fr. gras, cras; Lat. crassus=thick, fat; Sp. grasa; Port. graza; Ital. grasso.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Animal fat in a soft state; the oily or unctuous part of animal matter of any kind, as tallow, lard, &c.; especially the fatty matter of land animals, as distinguished from the oily matter of marine animals.

"Especially swine's grease, which in old time they used with great ceremony in religion."—P. Holland; Plinie, bk. xviii., ch. ix.

2. Min.: A term used in relation to luster; fat quartz has a greasy luster.

3. Farriery: A swelling and inflammation of the legs of a horse, attended with the secretion of oily matter and cracks in the skin.

grease-box, s.

Rail. Eng.: The receptacle over an axle arm, which contains the lubricating material.

grease-cock, s.

Mach.: A faucet by which oil is admitted to a journal-box, or other part requiring lubricating. It is used on the cylinder cover for lubricating the piston without permitting the escape of steam or the entrance of air.

grease-cup, s.

Mach.: A cup attached to a part requiring lubrication, and from which it is supplied with oil.

grease-pot, s. An iron pot, the third in the series in which iron plates are tinned. [TIN-PLATE.]

grease-wood, s.

Bot.: A stunted shrub of the spinach family; found in large quantities from Missouri to California.

grêase, *gres-yn, v. t. [GREASE, s.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: To smear or anoint with grease or fatty matter.

"They rub soot over the greased parts, especially their faces, which adds to their natural beauty as painting does in Europe."—Dampier; Voyage (an. 1691).

2. Fig.: To bribe; to corrupt or influence with presents.

"Every gaping heir

Would gladly grease the rich old bachelor."

Dryden; Juvenal, sat. vi.

II. Farriery: To affect with the disease called grease.

*[To grease in the hand or fist: To bribe.]

"He betrayed Scythopolis, having been well greased in the fist for his pains."—Usher; Annals (an. 3896).

grêas-êr, s. [Eng. greas(e); -er.]

1. One who or that which greases; specif., a man whose business it is to see that the wheels of locomotives, carriages, wagons, &c., are properly supplied with lubricants.

2. A contemptuous name for a Mexican.

grêas-i-ly, adv. [Eng. greasy; -ly.]

Great Charter, s. [MAGNA CHARTA.]

great-circle, s. [CIRCLE.]

Great-circle sailing:

Naut.: A system of navigation first introduced by Mr. John Towson of navigating a ship upon the principle that the nearest path between any two places upon a globe is by the great circle drawn upon it between them; the nearest course between two places on a sphere.

great-coat, s. An overcoat, a top-coat.

great-eared, a. Having large ears.

Great-eared leaf-bat: [MACROTUS.]

Great-eared tribes:

Anthrop.: A name sometimes employed to designate savage races who disfigure themselves by stretching their ears to an enormous size with what may be called exaggerated ear-rings. In this case the lobes are stretched into pendent fleshy loops; but the savages by no means answer the description of Pliny's Panotii (N. H., iv. 27), "whose ears were large enough to be used for covering their bodies." As a matter of fact the name Oregon is only a corruption of the Spanish Orejones (Big-ears), a nickname jocularly conferred on the inhabitants from their practice of enlarging the lobes of their ears. (Tylor.)

great-go, s.

Univ.: The same as GREATS. [GREAT, C. 3.]

Grecian architecture, s. The styles of architecture which prevailed in Greece and its colonies up to the conquest of the country by the Romans. The oldest examples which now remain belong to that type which is known under the name Cyclopean. [CYCLOPEAN.] Our earliest information respecting the architecture of Greece is gained from the poems of Homer. From him we learn that the palace was surrounded by Cyclopean walls, and had an outer and an inner court, the latter being surrounded by porticoes and chambers. This led to a large columnar hall for festive purposes. The chambers for the family and women were behind. Treasure-houses often existed in connection with the palaces, for the preservation of valuables. In plan these treasure-houses were circular, and the covering was dome-shaped. Of all that remain to this day, that of Atreus, at Mycenæ, is the most remarkable. The earliest style of regular architecture was that known as Doric [DORIC], which is characterized by simplicity and strength. The oldest example of it is a temple at Corinth. The Ionic order of architecture arose much about the same time, i. e., about 600 B. C. [IONIC.] Its characteristic features are grace and delicacy. To it belonged the temple of Diana, at Ephesus. About the beginning of the fifth century B. C. the Corinthian order began to come into use. It differs little from the Ionic except in greater lightness and increased richness of decoration. In spite of all differences of form and character of the details, the entire structure in their orders rests on the same principles. The use of the column is the great characteristic of all, and the differences between the three orders is most clearly perceptible in its treatment. The arch was never used in Grecian architecture.

Grecian-fire, s. [GREEK-FIRE.]

Grē-çlan-ize, v. i. [Eng. Grecian; -ize.] To speak the Greek language.

Greek Church, s.

Ecclesiol. & Ch. Hist.: The Eastern Church, that of the old Eastern Empire, which, prior to the Turkish conquest, had its metropolis at Constantinople, as distinguished from the Western Church, which had its capital at Rome; the church of the people speaking the Greek language rather than that of the Greek nation.

1. Church Hist.: That the Eastern and Western Churches would first disagree, and then separate, was insured from the first by the difference in their mental constitution. The Greeks were notable for intense intellectual acuteness, which they used to frame hair-splitting subtleties of doctrine. The Romans, on the contrary, who had the imperial instinct, employed the new faith as a means of building up again a world-embracing dominion, with the "eternal city" as its capital. The first variance between the East and the West arose in the second century regarding the time of keeping Easter. The disputes which succeeded were chiefly as to personal dignity. As long as Rome was the metropolis of the empire, the Bishop of Rome had indisputably the most important see in the Church; but when, on May 11, 330, Constantine removed the seat of government to Byzantium (Constantinople), the bishop of the new metropolis became a formidable rival to his ecclesiastical brother at Rome. In the second General Council, that of Constantinople, A. D. 381, the Bishop of Constantinople was allowed to sit next to the Bishop of Rome; by the 28th canon of the Synod of Chalcedon, A. D. 453, he was permitted to enjoy an equal rank. In 588, John, Patriarch of Constantinople, assumed the title of oecumenical or universal bishop for which he was denounced by Pope Gregory the Great. Disputes in the eighth century about image-worship widened the breach as did the continued rejection by the Greek Church of the word Filioque, asserting the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Son as well as from the Father, introduced by the second Council of Constantinople, A. D. 381. The last General Council in which the Churches of the East and the West were united was the Seventh, or Second Council of Nice, A. D. 787. The feud continued through the ninth and on to the eleventh century. In the thirteenth an effort was made by Michael Palæologus to promote a reunion of the two great churches at the Council of Florence, but all was in vain. They have remained separate till now. Efforts are said to be on foot looking to the union of the Greek and Roman churches.

2. Doctrine and discipline: The Bible as now interpreted by tradition is the rule of faith. Regarding the Trinity, the Divinity of Christ, the Atonement, and the work of the Holy Spirit, the Greek Church holds the ordinary faith of Christendom. Regarding what is termed the procession of the Holy Ghost, the East holds that he proceeded from the Father only, while the churches of the West believe that he did so from the Father and the Son (Fifth of the Thirty-nine Articles). With regard to the decrees of God, the Greek tenets are what would now be called strongly Arminian. Worship of a superior or of an inferior kind is rendered to the Virgin Mary, to saints and angels. The secular clergy are enjoined to marry once, and with a virgin. Images are in use. The communion is administered even to the laity in both kinds. The doctrine of purgatory is not accepted. Baptism is by immersion, and is followed by chrism or anointing. The government is episcopal. Excepting the Church of Rome, the Greek Church is the largest Christian organization, though it would be only the third if the several Protestant Churches were united into one. Its political importance arises mainly from the fact that the Emperor of Russia is regarded as its earthly head. It is the most numerous Christian body in the Turkish empire, and has a patriarch at Constantinople. It has many adherents also in the heterogeneous Austrian empire. The Russian emperor Nicholas delighted to call it "the orthodox faith." [ORTHODOX.]

green-sánd, s. & a. [Eng. green, and sand.]A. As substantive:

Geol.: The name given to two series of beds in the cretaceous formations, the one called the Upper, the other the Lower Greensand.

1. The Upper Greensand: This is a subdivision of the Upper Cretaceous Rocks, and is situated immediately below the Chalk-marl, and just above the Gault. The beds of which it is composed have in them green particles of a mineral called Glauconite (q. v.). Among the fossils peculiar to it are various ammonites, two pterodontas, two species of Fusus, &c. Of the derivative fauna, which is probably from the Gault, Mr. Soilas described corallites constituting phosphatic nodules, and Prof. Seeley an Ichthyosaurus, Cetarthrosaurus Walkeri, and other reptiles. Some are of opinion that the so-called Upper Greensand from which these fossils came is itself Gault.

2. The Lower Greensand: A series of beds constituting the Lower Cretaceous Rocks, and the lowest member of the Cretaceous group. It is called in Europe Neocomian, a name adopted by Lyell in his Students' Elements of Geology, he considering the term greensand peculiarly inapplicable, as in the district where these strata were first observed sand of a green color was the exception instead of the rule. [NEOCOMIAN.]

B. As adj.: Of, belonging to, or found in the Greensand; as, Greensand fossils.

green-shánk, s. [Eng. green, and shank.]

green-stóne, s. & a. [Eng. green, and stone.]A. As substantive:*1. Petrology:

*1. Formerly: A granular rock consisting of hornblende and imperfectly crystallized felspar, the felspar being more abundant than in basalt, and the grains or crystals of the two minerals more distinct from each other. It was called also Dolerite. Sir Charles Lyell also included under the term greenstone those rocks in which augite was substituted for hornblende, the "dolorite" of some writers, and those in which albite replaced common felspar. This was sometimes termed Andesite. (Lyell.)

(2) Now: The same as diorite, which is an essentially crystalline granular admixture of tridinic felspar and hornblende. Rutley proposes a partial return to the earlier signification, and would use greenstone as an ambiguous and comprehensive term useful in field geology, but expressive of ignorance with regard to the exact composition of volcanic rocks, either decomposed or otherwise incapable of exact identification. It is not now held to be the equivalent of dolerite (q. v.).

2. Geol.: Greenstone is a volcanic rock, occurring in dykes, tabular masses, &c.

B. As adj.: Containing more or less of greenstone, or akin to it in composition or other characters.

¶ Syenitic greenstone: [SYENITIC.]greenstone-trachytes, s. pl.

Petrol. & Geol.: Eruptive rocks, usually consisting of a more or less felspathic base, in which large crystals of plagioclase felspar, with others of hornblende and mica, are imbedded so as to give them a more or less strikingly porphyritic character. They are found in Hungary. (Quar. Jour. Geol. Soc., xxvii. 298.)

greenstone-tuffs, s. pl.

Petrol. & Geol.: Tuffs associated with greenstone. Rutley places them in the diabase group of crystalline eruptive rocks.

grë'-gär'-l-ni-da, grë'-gär'-l-na, s. [Mod. Lat. gregarina, and Lat. neut. pl. adj. suff. -ida.]

Zool.: The lowest of the eight classes into which Professor Huxley divides Cuvier's sub-kingdom Radiata. He places them in the sub-kingdom Protozoa. The species are all microscopic, and consist of a not very well defined membrane, more or less without structure, except that it contains a soft semi-fluid substance, having in the middle, or at one end of it, a delicate vesicle, inside of which is a more solid particle. Such a structure recalls that of an ovum, the outer membrane of the Gregarinida recalling the vitelline membrane of an ovum, the semi-fluid contents its yolk, the vesicle its germinal vesicle, and the more solid particle its germinal spot. There is no division of the body into parts. No mouth or digestive apparatus has been traced; there is, however, an expansion and contraction of the animal. The Gregarinida are found parasitic within the bodies of animals, specially the larvae of insects, in annelids, crustaceans, mollusca, &c., and even in vertebrated animals. They are specially abundant in the alimentary canal of the common cockroach, in earthworms, &c. Various genera are known, and the species are numerous.

grë'-gär'-l-ous, a. [Lat. gregarius, from grex (genit. gregis)=a flock.] Flocking or herding together; living or going in flocks or herds; not living solitarily.

"Of wild fowl, those which are the most useful fly not singly as other birds, but are commonly gregarious."—Grew: Cosmologia Sacra, bk. iii., ch. ii.

grë'-gär'-l-ous-ly, adv. [Eng. gregarious; -ly.] In a gregarious manner; in flocks or companies.

grë'-gär'-l-ous-nëss, s. [English gregarious; -ness.] The quality or state of being gregarious; the habit of living or going in flocks or herds; a disposition to associate.

grë'-gär'-y, a. [Latin gregarius.] Ordinary, common, gregarious.

grë'-gôe, grë'-gô, grîë'-gô, s. [Port. grego; Ital. greco; Span. griego=Greek.] A short jacket or cloak, with a hood attached, made of thick, coarse cloth, and worn by the Greeks and others in the Levant.

"The three latter, with their gregos, or night great-coats, with hoods."—Marryatt: Mr. Midshipman Easy, ch. xix.

Grë'-gôr'-l-an, a. [Low Lat. Gregorianus, from Gregorius; Gr. Gregoros=Gregory, from Gr. grëgôrë=to be awake, from egrëgôrä, perf. of egrëgôrë=to awake; Ital. & Sp. Gregoriano; Fr. Grégorien.] Pertaining to, established or produced by any one bearing the name of Gregory.

Gregorian-calendar, s. [CALENDAR, II. 3.]

Music: [PLAIN-SONG.]

Gregorian telescope, s. The first and most ordinary form of reflecting telescope, invented by James Gregory, Professor of Mathematics at St. Andrews, and afterward in Edinburgh, and described by him 1663. The image is viewed through an eye-piece in the aperture of the object-speculum. [TELESCOPE.]

Grëg'-ô-rý'-s-pôwdër, s. [Named after Dr. Gregory, who first compounded it.] A name given to Fulvis rhei compositus, compound rhubarb powder. It consists of powdered rhubarb, two ounces; light carbonate of magnesia, six ounces; and powdered ginger, one ounce.

grëis'-en, s. [Ger. = to grasp, to lay hold of, to seize.]

Petrol. & Geol.: A granular, crystalline rock, consisting of quartz and mica, the former predominating, the latter usually of the variety containing lithia. If orthoclase be superadded, the rock becomes granite. (Rutley: Study of Rocks.)

grëit, v. i. [GREET (2), v.]

grëith, v. t. [GRAITH, v.]

grëith, s. [GRAITH, s.]

grë'-mî'-al, a. & s. [Eccles. Lat. gremiale, from Lat. gremium=the bosom.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to the lap or bosom.

B. As substantive:

*1. Ord. Lang.: A bosom friend.

2. Eccles.: An episcopal ornament for the breast, lap, and shoulders, originally a towel of fine linen, used in ordination to protect the sacred vestments from any drops of unction that might fall in the act of anointing the candidates for the priesthood. In later times it was made of silk or damask to match the episcopal vestments.

*3. Univ.: One who resides in the bosom of the University. (Eng.)

"Which the governors and the rest of the gremials very well knew."—Styrupe: Cranmer, bk. ii., c. 6.

"The gremthe of the grim folke glod to his hert."—Alisaunder, 279.

grë'-nâ de, grâ'-nâ-dô, s. [Fr. grenade; from Sp. granada=a pomegranate, a grenade; granado=full of seeds, from Lat. granatus, from granum=a seed, a grain; Ital. granata.] A hollow ball or shell of metal or of annealed glass, filled with powder and fired by a fuse. After the fuse is lighted the ball is thrown among the enemy, when it bursts and causes great injury or loss.

"Whole streets had been burned down by the mortars and grenades of the Cavaliers."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. v.

¶ (1) Hand-grenade: A small grenade, usually about 2½ inches in diameter, intended to be thrown by hand into trenches or saps, or upon besiegers sealing a breach; a bottle filled with a fire-quenching liquid, intended to be used in cases of incipient fires.

(2) Rampart-grenade: A grenade of various sizes used for rolling over the parapet in a trough.

grën'-a-diër, s. [Fr., from grenade=a grenade (q. v.).]

1. Mil.: Originally a soldier employed to throw the hand-grenade; afterward, a member of a special body of infantry selected for their superior stature, peculiarly uniformed, and given a post on the right of the line.

2. Zoology:

(1) A South-African bird of the finch family (Pyromelania orix), having very brilliant plumage, its back being red and its lower parts black.

(2) A name given to a numerous family of marine fishes, commonly called onion fishes, and rat-tail fishes. Genus Mucurus.

grën'-a-dîl-lô, grâ'-nîl-lô, s. [Sp. (?)]

Bot.: A cabinet wood from the West Indies. It resembles the common cocoa, having, however, at first a lighter color than it, though becoming darker on exposure. Called also Grenada cocos or cocus, and Red Ebony.

grën'-a-dîne, s. [Fr.]

Fabric: A thin, gauzy silk or woolen fabric, used for ladies' dresses, shawls, &c.

grën'-a-tite, grân'-a-tite, s. [Lat. granatum=a pomegranate; granum=a grain, and -ite (Min.) (q. v.); Fr. grenat. Named from its color.] Min.: The same as STAUROLITE (q. v.).

grëng'-ê-site, grâng'-ê-site, s. [From Grängesberg, in Dalecarlia, Sweden; suff. -ite (Min.) (q. v.).] Min.: A dark green variety of Pyrochlorite.

grëss-ör'-l-al, a. [Mod. Lat. gressorius, from Lat. gressus=a stepping.]

Ornith.: Adapted for stepping or for walking. Used of birds which have three toes forward, two of them connected, and one behind.

grē-vīl-lē-ə, s. [Named after C. F. Greville, a patron of botany.]

Bot.: The typical genus of the proteaceous family Grevillidæ (q. v.). It consists of handsome Australian plants.

grē-vīl-lī-də, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. grevill(ea); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Bot.: A family of Proteaceæ, sub-order Folliculares.

grew' (ew as ô), pret. of v. [GROW.]

grew (ew as ô), grûe, v. i. [Dut. gruven; Ger. grauen; Dan. grue=to shudder; from grue=horror.] [GRUESOME.] To shudder, to feel horror, to shiver.

"I downa look at them—I never see them but they gar me greu."—Scott: Rob Roy, ch. xxvii.

grew (ew as ô), s. [Icel. grey=a dog.] A greyhound (q. v.).

"I have six terriers at home, forby two couple of slow-hounds, five grews, and a wheen other dogs."—Scott: Guy Mannering, ch. xxii.

grew'-lā (ew as ô), s. [Named after Nehemiah Grew, M. D. F. R. S., a celebrated English physiologist, who died in 1711.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Grewidæ, sepals 5, petals 5; stamens numerous; style 1; stigma 4-lobed, drupe with one to four small nuts, one or two-seeded. About eighty species are known. Grewia sapida and G. asiatica have pleasant acid berries, used for making sherbet. The wood of G. elastica, called in India dhannoo, is strong and elastic; it is used for bows, the shafts of carriages, &c.

grew'-lā-də (ew as ô), s. pl. [Mod. Lat. grew(ia); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Bot.: A family of plants, order Tiliaceæ, tribe Tiliæ.

grew'-sōmo (ew as ô), a. [GREW, v.] Horrible, gruesome.

"And sic gruesome wishes, that men should be slaughtered like sheep."—Scott: Rob Roy, ch. xxi.

grey, a. & s. [GRAY.]

¶ Compounds not inserted here will be found under GRAY.

Ornith.: A name for the Peregrine Falcon (Falco peregrinus). [FALCON, PEREGRINE.]

grey-wether, s.

Petrol.: A bowlder or slate of siliceous sandstone. Some of the so-called Druidic standing stones are grey-wethers.

"From their long exposure to the atmosphere they are incrustated with various lichens, which at times gives them a darkish hue, from the decay of the vegetable matter; whence, and from the circumstance of their resembling at a distance a flock of sheep, they have received the name of Grey-wethers."—J. Britton: Beauties of England and Wales, v. 716.

grey'-hound, grai'-hond, grai'-hound, gray-hund, grea'-hund, gre'-hound, gre'-hownde, grei'-hound, grey'-hownd, grew'-hounde, s. [Icel. greyhound, from grey=a dog, and hund=a hound.]

Zoöl., &c.: A variety of the Canis familiaris, or Common Dog, characterized by its slender and symmetric form, its strength, its keen sight, and its swiftness. A dog, apparently of this type, is figured on the Egyptian monuments. It is used in the chase, and domestication has led to its separation into various breeds, as the Irish, the Highland, and the Arabian Greyhounds. An old rhyme describes the characters deemed the best:

"Headed like a snake, necked like a drake,
Foted like a catte, tayed like a ratte,
Syded like a breme, and chyned like a beme."

Yonatt suggests that the greyhound may be identical with the gazehound of old English writers. Against this view must be set the fact that Tickell distinguishes them.

"See'st thou the gazehound? how with glance severe
From the close herd he marks the destined deer?
How every nerve the greyhound's stretch displays,
The hare preventing in her airy maze."
Fragment of a Poem on Hunting.

grey'-béard, s. & a. [GRAYBEARD.]

grey'-ish, a. [GRAYISH.]

Greys, s. pl. [GREY, a.]

Mil.: A regiment of cavalry in the British army, originally Scottish, and so called from the horses being all of a gray color. They are also called the Scots Greys.

grey'-stōne, grāy'-stōne, s. [Eng. gray or grey, and stone; Ger. graustein, with the same significance.]

Petrol.: A volcanic lead-gray or greenish rock, composed of felspar and augite, the felspar being more than seventy-five per cent. (Scrope.) Grey-stone lavas are intermediate in composition between basaltic and trachytic lavas. (Lyell.)

grey-wāc'-kē, grāy-wāc'-kē, grāu-wāc'-kē, s. [Ger. grauwacke.]

1. Petrol.: The popular name used by German miners to designate a particular kind of sandstone, usually an aggregate of small fragments of quartz, flinty slate, or Lydian stone and clay-slate cemented by argillaceous matter. (Lyell.)

2. Geol.: The older palæozoic strata. As, however, rocks of the petrological aspect called grauwacke occur in the Old Red Sandstone, in the millstone grit of Carboniferous age, in the Cretaceous Rocks, and in the Eocene, the term is not a good one to distinguish any single geological period; it has, therefore, been exchanged for Silurian (q. v.).

grey'-wēath-ēr, s. [GREY-WETHER.]

grī'-ās, s. [From Gr. grāō=to gnaw, to eat.]

Bot.: A genus of Barringtoniaceæ. Grias cauliflora is the Anchovy Pear (q. v.).

grib'-ble, s. [Etym. doubtful.]

Zoöl.: Limnoria terebrans, an isopod crustacean, section Cymothoada. It is above two lines in length; it rolls itself up like a woodlouse, and attacks the timber of ships, to which it is most destructive.

grīce, gris, grise, gryce, grys, gryse, s. [Icel. griss; Sw. gris; Dan. grüss.]

1. A young or sucking pig.

"Tee e'en lay the head o' the sow to the tail of the grice."—Scott: Rob Roy, ch. xxiv.

2. A young badger.

"I am a lord of other geere! this fine
Smooth bowson's cub, the young grice of a gray;
Twa tynie urchins, and this ferret gay."

Ben Jonson: The Sad Shepherd, ii. 2.

grid'-dle, gird'-dle, gred'-el, gred'-il, grid-ele, s. [Wel. gredyll, greidell, gradell=a griddle, from gredid=to scorch; Ir. greidéal, greidéal, from greadam=to parch, to burn (Skeat). Or from Low Lat. graticula, craticula, dimin. of Lat. crates=a hurdle.]

"With brandisht tongue the emptie aire did gride." Spenser: Virgil's Gnat, 264.

2. To jar, to grate.

"The wood which grides and clangs Its leafless ribs." Tennyson: In Memoriam, cvi. 11.

B. Intransitive:

1. To cut, to pierce.

"The griding sword, with discontinuous wound, Passed through him." Milton: P. L., vi. 329.

2. To wound or cut mentally.

"Gridding anguish pierced his fluttering breast." Sir W. Jones: Pindar; First Nemean Ode.

gride, s. [GRIDE, v.] A harsh or grating sound, as of scraping or cutting. (Whittier.)

grid'-lin, grēd'-ā-line, s. [Fr. gris de lin=the gray of flax.] A color mixed, or white and red, or a gray violet.

grid'-iron (iron as i-ēr), gyrd'-iron, gred-irne, gred'-yrne, gred'-ire, gred'-yre, grid-ire, gyrd'-yrne, s. [A corruption of Mid. Eng. gredire=a griddle (q. v.).] [GREDIRE.]

1. Ord. Lang.: A grated iron utensil on which fish, flesh, and fowl are exposed for broiling.

2. Hydraulic Engin.: A grated frame on which ships are hauled out of the water for examination, cleaning, and repairs. Or a framing of cross-timbers which receives a ship with the falling tide.

gridiron'-pendulum, s.

Horol.: A compensation pendulum in which the bob is supported by parallel bars of two metals which are unequally expanded by heat. These are so disposed that, while one tends to lengthen it, the other tends to shorten it. The ratio of lengths is determined by the relative expansibility. [PENDULUM.]

gridiron'-valve, s.

Steam-engin.: A valve whose opening is divided into a number of narrow parts by which the travel may be abridged, and the more rapid opening or closing of the valve effected.

grīce, s. [GREE (2), s.]

Her.: A step or degree, as one of the steps upon which crosses are sometimes placed.

grīf, grief, greif, grefe, greefe, greffe, greve, grieve, s. [O. Fr. gref, grief; Fr. grief, from Lat. gravis=heavy.]

1. Pain of mind, sorrow, or trouble for something past, as the loss of a friend or relation, misconduct, or ungratefulness on the part of others, &c.; sadness.

"Grief is sometimes considered as synonymous with sorrow; and in this case we speak of the transports of grief. At other times it expresses more silent, deep, and painful affections, such as are inspired by domestic calamities."—Cogan: On the Passions, vol. i., pt. i., ch. ii.

2. That which causes sorrow, sadness, or pain of mind; a trial, a grievance, a misfortune.

"I here forget all former griefs." Shakesp.: Two Gentlemen of Verona, v. 4.

3. Bodily pain or suffering; disease.

"My limbs weakened with grief." Shakesp.: Henry IV., Pt. II., i. 1.

4. A fault, an offense.

"To implore forgiveness of all griefs." Douglas: Virgil, 453, 43.

¶ To come to grief: To meet with accident or calamity; to come to ruin; to fail utterly; to come to a bad end.

grief-worn, a. Worn out by grief.

"A gray and grief-worn aspect of old days." Byron: Childe Harold, iii. 65.

grīf'-fūl, a. [English grief; -ful (l).] Full of grief or sorrow; very sad.

"Which when she sees with ghastly griefful eyes Her heart does quake." Spenser: F. Q., VI. viii. 40.

grīf'-hood, gref'-hed, s. [Eng. grief; -hood.] That which causes grief.

grīf'-lēss, a. [Eng. grief; -less.] Free from or without grief.

B. As adv.: Grievedly.

"When I was grievly bigo with a grim people." Alisaunder: Frag., 994.

grīf'-shōt, a. [Eng. grief, and shot.] Pierced or stricken with grief; sorrow-stricken.

"Griefshot with his unkindness." Shakesp.: Coriolanus, v. 1.

grī'-gō, s. [GREGGOG.]

grīev'-ā-ble, grev'-ā-ble, a. [Eng. grieve (e); -able.] Causing grief; lamentable.

"There is a vice full grievable To hym, whiche is therof culpable." Gower: C. A., bk. v.

grīev'-ānce, grev'-ānce, grev'-aunce, s. [O. Fr. grévança, from gref, grief; Ital. gravenza.]

1. Hurt, harm, annoyance.

2. A state of grief, sorrow, or pain of mind; affliction, uneasiness.

3. Anything which causes grief, sorrow, or pain of mind; especially anything which gives grounds for complaint, remonstrance, or resistance; a hardship, an injury, an injustice.

"It bears no sounding name, nor ever bore;
A standing grievance." Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. ix.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between grieve and hardship: "The grievance implies that which lies heavy at heart. Hardship implies that which presses or bears violently on the person. The grievance is in general taken for that which is done by another to grieve or distress: the hardship is a particular kind of grievance that presses upon individuals. There are national grievances, though not national hardships. An infraction of one's rights, an act of violence or oppression, are grievances to those who are exposed to them whether as individuals or bodies of men: an unequal distribution of labor, a partial indulgence of one to the detriment of another, constitutes the hardship." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) grievance-monger, s. One who is always railing up or talking about his own or his party's grievances or supposed grievances, public or private.

grīev'-ānce-ēr, s. [Eng. grievance (e); -er.] One who causes or commits a grievance; one who gives grounds for complaint.

"Some petition against the bishops as grievancers." Fuller.

grīève, greve, greven, grev-y, grev-yn, v. t. & i. [O. Fr. grever; Prov. grevar, grevar, from Lat. gravo=to burden; gravis=heavy; Ital. gravare; Sp. & Port. gravar.]

"The prycke of conscience greiveth me sore."
Penitential Psalms, p. 8.

3. To offend against.

"Grieve not the holy spirit of God."—Ephes. iv. 30.

4. To lament, to mourn, to deplore, to sorrow over.

"The nothing that I grieve."
Shakespeare: Richard II., ii. 2.

B. Intrans. To feel grief, sorrow, or pain; to mourn, to lament, to sorrow. (Generally followed by at, for, or over.)

"Grieve, and they grieve."—Dryden: Juvenal, sat. iii.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between to grieve, to mourn, and to lament: "To grieve is the general term; mourn the particular term. To grieve, in its limited sense, is an inward act; to mourn is an outward act: the grief lies altogether in the mind. A man grieves for his sins; he mourns for the loss of his friends. Grieve is the act of an individual; mourn may be the common act of many: a nation mourns, though not grieves, for a public calamity. Grieve and mourn are permanent sentiments; lament is a transitory feeling; the former are produced by substantial causes, which come home to the feelings. Mourn and lament are both expressed by some outward sign; but the former is composed and free from all noise; the latter displays itself either in cries or simple words." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

*griève, *greëve, s. [A. S. gerefa; Icel. greifi; Sw. grefve; Dan. greve.] An overseer, a steward, a reeve, a bailiff.

griff (1), s. [Etym. doubtful.]

Weav. A series of horizontal parallel-edged bars, also known as knives or blades, arranged in a reciprocating frame to raise and lower the vertical hooked rods connected to the shedding mechanism, when the hooked ends of the rods are brought by a pattern device within the path of the knives.

*griff (2), s. [A variant of GRIP.] Reach, grasp, grip.

griffe, s. [Fr.] A mulatto woman; the child of a mulatto woman by a negro.

grif-fin (1), s. [GRIFFON.]

grif-fin (2), s. [Etym. doubtful, but perhaps the same word as Griffin (1) (q. v.), the new-comer being looked upon as a strange animal neither English nor Indian, as a griffon is neither lion nor eagle.] An Anglo-Indian sportive term for a new-comer who has arrived from Europe. He makes ludicrous mistakes, not however like the scholastikos of the Greeks from deficiency of intellect, but from want of Indian experience. Taking advantage of this, if he be a young cadet, his companions in arms sometimes willfully cause him to fall into blunders, which left to himself he might avoid. [GRIFFINAGE]

"All the griffins ought to hunt together."—H. Kingsley: Geoffry Hamlyn, ch. xxviii.

grif-fin-age (age as ig), s. [Eng. griffin; -age.] The state of a griffin—i. e., of a new-comer from Europe. It is generally held to continue a year. [ANGLO-INDIAN.]

Grimm, s. [See compound.]

Grimm's-law, s.

Philol.: A law formulated by Jacob Grimm, the eminent German philologist, relative to the changes undergone by mute consonants in the most important of the Aryan languages. According to this law, if the same roots or the same words exist in Sanscrit, Greek, Latin, Celtic, Slavonic, Lithuanian, Gothic (with which are included English and other Low German dialects), and Old High German, then, whenever the Sanscrit or Greek has an aspirate, the Gothic has the corresponding flat mute. If in Sanscrit, Greek, &c., we find a flat mute, then we find a corresponding sharp mute in Gothic, and a corresponding aspirate in High German. If in Sanscrit, Greek, &c., we find a sharp mute, the Gothic shows the corresponding aspirate, and Old High German the corresponding flat mute. Thus the labials, b, p, f, in Greek, Latin, or Sanscrit, become f, b, p respectively in Gothic, and b (v), f, p in Old High German; the dentals t, d, th in Greek, Latin, or Sanscrit become th, d, t in Gothic, and d, z, t in Old High German; and the gutturals k, g, ch in Greek, Latin, or Sanscrit become h (not quite regularly), k, g in Gothic and g, ch, k in Old High German. Thus: Sanscrit pitrī; Greek patēr; Latin, pater; Gothic, faðreīn; English, father; Old High German, vatar.

"Yet trust not Hob Grouthead, for sleeping too long."
Tusser: May's Husbandry, § 32.

grout-ing, s. [Eng. grout; -ing.]

Building:

1. The act or process of filling up the joints or spaces between stones by pouring in grout.

2. Grout.

*grout-nōl, *grout-nōld, s. [Cf. grouthead; -nol=head.]

1. A blockhead.

"That same dwarf's a pretty boy, but the squire's a grouthead."—Beaum. & Flot. Knight of the Burning Pestle, ii.

2. A kind of fish.

grōve, s. [A derivative from grave = to cut. Hence grove is a doublet of groove (q. v.).]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: A cluster or group of trees shading an avenue or walk; a small wood.

"Thou shouldest never out of this grove pace."
Chaucer: C. T., 1,604.

2. Fig.: A cluster or group of objects resembling a grove or wood.

II. Comparative Religion:

1. Ethnic: The sacred character of groves is closely but not inseparably connected with Tree- and Serpent-worship (q. v.). Bearing in mind the dictum of Statius (Theb., iii. 661), "Primus in orbe deos fecit timor," one can imagine how the solitude and mystery of primeval forests must have wrought on uncultured races, and led them to hold such places in reverence as the abode of the mighty and not always beneficent nature-forces. As man progressed, and the objects of his worship became personified, the sacred character of groves by no means passed away. The grove at Dodona, and Grant Allen's spirited translation of Catullus (Carm. lxiii.), in which we read of the frantic fury of Atys, of his repentance and flight, and how when the turret-crowned goddess heard his plaint, she sent one of her lions after the fugitive, with the result that he "Fled back to the grove aghast, There all the days of his lifetime as Cybellē's thrall he passed"— will prove the case for Greece; and there is scarcely a Latin poet whose works do not furnish instances in point. Ovid (Met. viii. 741, sqq.) tells of the fate that befell Erichon, because he ravaged Ceres' sacred grove—i. e., in which Ceres herself was worshipped. The Germania of Tacitus (7, 9, 39, 40, 43) furnishes the earliest testimony to the estimation in which groves were held by Teutonic and kindred nations. Other passages occur in the Annals and the History, and Stallybrass thus anglicizes Grimm's (Deut. Myth., ch. iv.) condensation of them:

"Gods dwell in these groves; no images are mentioned by name as being set up, no temple walls are reared. But sacred vessels and altars stand in the forest, heads of animals hang on the boughs of trees. There divine worship is performed and sacrifice offered."

From Pliny (H. N., xvi. 95) we learn the part that groves of oak-trees played among the ancient Druids, and he seems to favor the derivation of their name from the Greek *dry*s. There is also a fine passage on the same subject in Lucan (Phar., i. 447-54). In remote places, a belief in the sacredness of groves still lingers. Sir John Lubbock (Origin of Civilization (1882), p. 287) says that "even recently an oak copse in the Isle of Skye was held to be so sacred that no one would venture to cut the smallest branch from it." Dennis (Buried Cities of Etruria, i. 57) says that he saw a clump of trees on Monte Musino, and considers it a relic of a sacred grove; and Fergusson (Rude Stone Monuments, ch. xiii.) says of the Khonds and the Khasias, "In Cuttack we have sacred groves, human sacrifices, and a powerful priesthood, all savoring of Druidism."

2. Jewish:

(1) In a solitary passage of the Old Testament, "grove" is the probably correct rendering of the Hebrew word eshel. Abraham "planted" one in Beersheba, and "called there on the name of the Lord, the everlasting God" (Gen. xxi. 33). The original meaning of the word Eshel is a particular tree; Gesenius thinks the Oriental Tamarisk (Tamarix orientalis), which, however, scarcely be shady enough. Elon, rendered in the Authorized Version "plain," seems to mean "grove." If so, then Abraham at a certain period lived in one, that of Mamre (Gen. xiv. 13), and built an altar in it to Jehovah (Gen. xiii. 18); while in a second one there was an important pillar (Judg. ix. 6). Other groves were those of Moreh (Gen. xii. 6), of Zaanaim (Judg. iv. 11), of Tabor (1 Sam. x. 3), &c.

(2) In all other cases in the text of the A. V., "grove" is the rendering of the Hebrew word Asherah, which is almost certainly an idol, and not a plantation of trees, for Josiah brought one out of the house of the Lord (2 Kings xxii. 6). The people of Judah also "built them" high places, images, and groves (1 Kings xiv. 23). The combination of images and groves occurs constantly (2 Kings xvii. 16; 2 Chron. xiv. 3; Isa. xxvii. 9, &c.). The idol seems to have been of wood, for it could both be cut down (Exod. xxxiv. 13; Deut. vii. 5; Judg. vi. 25-28; 2 Kings xviii. 4, xxiii. 14; 2 Chron. xiv. 3, xxxi. 1, xxxiv. 3-4) and burnt (Deut. xii. 3; 2 Kings xxiii. 15). It was upright (?), and therefore probably of the human and not the bestial form (Isa. xxvii. 9). The name Asherah recalls that of the Phœnician goddess Ashtoreth; the former, as suggested by Bertheau, being probably the name of her idol, the latter of herself. There was a relation between Baal and Asherah, and while in Elijah's time there assembled at Carmel, 450 prophets of Baal, there were with them 400 "prophets of the groves" (1 Kings xviii. 19). The Asherah seems to have been connected with phallic rites. [ASHTORETH.] grove-dock, s.

Bot.: Rumex nemolapathum.

grove-spirits, s. pl. [FOREST-SPIRITS.]

Grove, s. [William Robert Grove, F. R. S.]

Grove battery, Grove's battery, s.

Elect. Mach.: A double fluid galvanic-battery, invented, in 1839, by W. R. Grove, F. R. S. It consists of a plate of amalgamated zinc, generally bent into a shape like the letter U, so as to embrace a flat cell of porous earthenware in which is suspended a sheet of platinum foil. The porous cell is filled with strong nitric acid, and the whole arrangement placed in a jar containing dilute acid one in twenty.

Grove's cell, s.

Elect.: A cell or jar of a Grove's battery.

"The destructive force of a Grove's cell."—Everett: C. G. S. System of Units (1875), ch. xi., p. 74.

Grove's gas-battery, s.

Elect. Mach.: A battery in which there are two glass tubes, and within each a platinum electrode, covered with finely-divided platinum, and furnished on the outside with binding screws. One of the tubes is partially filled with hydrogen, the other partially with oxygen, and they are inverted over dilute sulphuric acid, so that half the platinum is in the liquid and half in the gases. By joining the dissimilar plates a battery is produced so powerful that one element of it will decompose iodide of potassium, and four will decompose water. (Ganot.)

grōv-el, v. i. [From the adv. groveling (q. v.), the termination -ing being mistaken for the sign of the pr. par. of a verb.] [GROF.]

 which utter sounds like grumbling when, being caught, they are lifted from the water. (Griffith's Cuvier.)

Grüm'-ble-tö-ni-ang, s. [Etymol. doubtful.]

Hist.: The inhabitants of an imaginary town or parish notable for grumbling; a nickname given in England to the Country, as distinguished from the Court party during the reigns of the later Stuarts.
 The reason why they grumbled was that, in modern language, they constituted the Opposition, and naturally found fault with the measures of their political adversaries who were in power.

"Who were sometimes nicknamed the Grumbletonians, and sometimes honored with the appellation of the Country party."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xix.

grüm'-blng, pr. par., a. & s. [GRUMBLE, v.]
 A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

 sullenness.

"The grumness of thy countenance."—Wycherley: Country Wife, i. 1.

grü-möse, a. [Mod. Lat. grumosus, from Class.
 Lat. grumus=a little bill, a hillock.]
 Bot.: Clubbed, k otted. (Paxton.) [GRUMOUS.]

grü-möus, a. [Eng. grum(e); -ous.]

*I. Ord. Lang.: Thick, clotted, concretion.

"But, having for this purpose exposed some serum of human blood to cold air, in two freezing nights consecutively, the serum was not found to congeal, though some grumous parts of the same blood did, as has formerly been noted."—Boyle: Works, vol. iv., p. 151.

II. Technically:

1. Anat. (of blood): Clotted, coagulated.

2. Bot.: Divided into little clustered grains, as the fecula in the stem of the sago palm, or the root of Neottia Nidus-avis. (Lindley.) grü-möus-ness, s. [Eng. grumous; -ness.] The quality or state of being grumous; clotted or concreted.

grün-tle, groun-tle, v. i. [A frequentative from GRUNT (q. v.).] To grunt.

"Ly as a sow muzling and grountling vpon the earth."—Rollock: On 1 Thes., p. 9.

grün-tle, s. [GRUNTLE, v.]

1. A grunting noise.

2. A snout.

"An' gouts torment him inch by inch,

Wha twists his gruntle wi' a glunch."

Burns: Scotch Drink.

grünt-llîng, s. [Eng. grunt; dimin. suff. -ling.] A young pig or hog.

grünts, s. [GRUNT, s., II.]

grün-xië, s. [GROIN (2), s.] The mouth; the snout.

"She dights her grunzie wi' a hushion."

Burns: Sic A Wife as Willie Had.

Grüs, grüs, s. [Lat.=a crane.]

1. Ornith. (of the form grus): The typical genus of the sub-family Gruinæ, and the family Gruideæ. [CRANE.]

2. Astron. (of the form Grus): The Crane, a constellation introduced by Bayer, and now arranged as one of Lacaille's twenty-seven Southern constellations. It is situated between Eridanus and Sagittarius.

grý, s. [Gr. gru=a grunt, a syllable; a bit.]

1. A measure, equal to one-tenth of a line.

"Three inches and nine grýs long, and one inch seven lines in girt."—Boyle: Works, vi. 641.

2. Anything very small, or of little value.

Grå-yëre, s. & a. [Fr. Gruyère, Gruyères; Ger. Gruyter.]

A. As subst.: A town in Switzerland, canton Fribourg.

B. As adj.: Of or belonging to the place described under A.

Gruyère-cheese, s. A celebrated kind of cheese made at Gruyère. It owes its flavor chiefly to Melilotus officinalis.

grýde, v. t. [GRIDE.]

gryf-on, s. [GRIFFIN.]

grýl-lî-dæ, s. pl. [Lat. gryll(us); fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Entom.: A family of saltatorial orthoptera, made to include the crickets, or sometimes the grasshoppers. [GRYLLUS etym.] In the former case the grasshoppers are called Acridiidae, from the genus Acridium or Acrydium. In the latter the Crickets are termed Achetidae (q. v.). The family Gryllidae is now elevated into a tribe Gryllina (q. v.).

grýl-lî-næ, s. pl. [Lat. gryllus; neut. pl. adj. suff. -ina.]

Entom.: A tribe of saltatorial orthoptera. The outer wings in repose are sloped like a roof, the antennæ are long, slender, and tapering. The tarsi are four-jointed. The males have an apparatus at the base of the wing-covers for chirping. The female has an exerted ovipositor.

grýl-lô-tål-væ, s. [Lat. gryllus=a cricket, and talpa=a mole.]

Entom.: Mole-cricket; a genus of crickets (Achetidae or Gryllidae) having the legs and tarsi of both the anterior feet broad, flat, and indented like hands, so as to be well adapted for digging.

grýl-lüs, s. [Lat.=a cricket, a grasshopper.]

Entom.: The typical genus of the family Gryllidae and the tribe Gryllina (q. v.). [GRASSHOPPER.]

grý-phæ-æ, s. [Lat. gryps (genit. gryphis)=a griffin.]

Palæont.: A sub-genus of Ostrea (oyster), having the left valve with a prominent incurved umbo, the right one small and concave. Thirty species are known from the Lias to the Chalk. (Woodward, &c.)

grýph-îte, s. [Lat. gryphus=a griffin, and -ite (Palæont.).] [GRYPHÆA.]

Palæont.: An old name for a gryphæa (q. v.).

Geol.: Lias, so called from the fact that Gryphæas abounds in it.

gryph-on, s. [GRIFFON.]

grýp-lî-næ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. grypus, gryphus, and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -inæ.]

Ornithology: Wedge-tailed Humming-birds, a sub-family of Trochilidae (Humming-birds), type Gryphus (q. v.).

grý-pô-sis, grý-phô-sis, s. [Mod. Lat., from Gr. gryppô=to become bent. (Used of the nails.)]

Pathol.: The growing of the nails inward.

grý-pûs, grý-phûs, subst. [Latin gryphus=a griffin; grypus=Gr. grypos=curved, hook-nosed.]

Ornithology: The typical genus of the sub-family Gryphinae (q. v.). Only one species is known, which is from Brazil.

grýs-bök, grýs-bök, s. [Dutch grijsbok, from grijs=gray, and bok=goat.]

Zool.: A South African antelope (Calotragus melanotis). It has straight, upright, pointed, shining horns, with two or three small annuli at the roots. On the upper parts the hair is red mixed with white, below it is sandy-brown or red, and on some there is black about the head. Length of the animal, nearly three feet. It is found in South Africa, goes in pairs, not in herds, and furnishes excellent venison.

gû-a-çhar-ô, s. [Sp. guacharo and guacharaca, from the cavern and mountain of Guacharo, in the valley of Caripe, in Venezuela.]

Ornith.: Steatornis caripensis, a goatsucker from South America, which feeds, however, not on flying insects, but on hard fruits, a very rare characteristic of a nocturnal bird. It is valued for its fat, to obtain which the Indians slaughter it in the cavern of Guacharo once a year. (Humboldt.)

guacharo-bird, s.

Ornith.: The same as GUACHARO (q. v.).

guacharo-oil, s. The fat of the Guacharo-bird, which, on being melted, becomes half liquid, transparent, and inodorous. It will keep for a year without turning rancid.

guacharo-seeds, s. pl. Seeds found in the gizzard of the Guacharo-bird.

gû-a'-cô, s. [Native name in Central America.]

Botany:

1. Property: Aristolochia guaco, a plant celebrated for its efficacy in curing snake-bites.

2. Hence: Other plants with the same properties, spec., Mikania guaco and Aristolochia anguicaia.

1. Mexican guaco:

Pharm.: A poison stated to be from a species of convolvulus.

guâ-dâl-çâ-zar-îte (u as w), s. [Named by Petersen from its original locality, Guadalcázar, in Mexico.]

Min.: A mineral essentially a seleno-sulphide of mercury and zinc. It is represented by the formula $6\text{HgS} + \text{ZnS}$. It occurs massive and crypto-crystalline, and is of a deep black color. Though resembling cinnabar in composition, it is quite different in its physical properties, having a bluish-black streak and a greasy, metallic luster. (T. Davies, F. G. S.)

guaiac (as gwâ-yâk), a. & s. [Native name of the tree in parts of South America.]

A. As subst.: Guaiacum (q. v.).

B. As adj.: Of or belonging to guaiacum.

guaiac (as gwâ-yâs-îc), a. [English, &c., guaiacum; -ic.] Pertaining to, or derived from, Guaiacum (q. v.).

guaiac-acid, s.

Chem.: Guaiaretic acid, $\text{C}_{20}\text{H}_{26}\text{O}_4$. Obtained by boiling powdered guaiacum resin with milk of lime for half an hour, filtering and extracting the residue with hot alcohol, distilling off the alcohol, and dissolving the acid in caustic soda, decomposing the crystallized sodium salt with hydrochloric acid, and recrystallizing from glacial acetic acid. Guaiac-acid is thus obtained in colorless needles, which melt at 80°. They are soluble in alcohol, and the solution gives a grass-green color with ferric chloride. It forms crystalline salts.

guaiacol (as gwâ-yâ-côl), s. [Eng., &c., guaiacum], and (alcohol).

Chem.: $\text{C}_7\text{H}_8\text{O}_2$, or $\text{C}_6\text{H}_4<\text{OH}^{(1)}\text{OCH}_3^{(2)}$. Methyl ether of pyrocatechin. Obtained by the dry distillation of guaiacum resin. It is also found in wood-tar creosote. It is also formed by the dry distillation of calcium vanillate with slaked lime; and by heating to 170° equal molecules of pyrocatechin, caustic potash, and methyl potassium sulphate. Guaiacol is a pleasant-smelling aromatic oil, boiling at 200°. When heated with hydriodic acid, it is decomposed into methyl iodide and pyrocatechin. When heated with zinc dust, it yields anisol, $\text{C}_6\text{H}_5\text{OCH}_3$. Its alcoholic solution gives an emerald-green color, with ferric chloride. It unites with alkalis.

guaiaconic (as gwâ-yâ-côn-îc), a. [Eng., &c., guaiacum], and -onic.] (See the compound.)

guaiaconic-acid, s.

Chem.: $\text{C}_{10}\text{H}_{12}\text{O}_4$. Contained in the mother liquor obtained in the preparation of guaiac acid. The liquid is evaporated to dryness, and the residue treated with boiling alcohol, evaporated, and separated from the resin by means of ether. Guaiaconic acid is amorphous, melting at 100°, and is insoluble in water. It is easily soluble in alcohol, ether, chloroform, and in acetic acid. It is turned blue by oxidizing agents. The calcium and lead salts are insoluble in alcohol.

guaiacum (as gwâ-yâ-cûm), s. [Latinized from guaiac (q. v.).]

1. Bot.: A genus of Zygophyllaceæ, tribe Zygophylleæ (q. v.). Calyx of five unequal segments; petals five-stalked; stamens ten; fruit, a five-angled, five-celled capsule, sometimes by abortion two or three-celled. Guaiacum officinale is an ornamental tree with blue flowers, growing in Jamaica. The wood furnishes Lignum vite (q. v.); its resin is called Gumguaiacum (q. v.). The leaves of G. sanctum are used in the West Indies as a substitute for soap. The bark and wood of both species are used as sudorifics, diaphoretics, or alternatives.

2. Phar.: Guaiac wood, Lignum vite, Guaiaci lignum, the wood of Guaiacum officinale, a native of St. Domingo and Jamaica. When a log is bored longitudinally and placed in the fire, a dark brown aromatic resin exudes, which is collected, and which is soluble in alcohol and ether. An alcoholic solution gives a blue color when placed on a slice of a raw potato, the guaiac acid acting on the gluten. The resin is used to prepare Mixtura guaiaci (Mixture of guaiacum), and Tinctura guaiaci ammoniata (Ammoniated tincture of guaiacum). The resin taken internally causes irritation of the intestinal canal. The tincture is used externally in cases of chronic rheumatism as a stimulant.

Chem.: A reddish-brown resin, obtained from the wood of Guaiacum officinale. The resin dissolves in potash; and in concentrated sulphuric acid with a red color. A tincture of the resin is turned blue by oxidizing agents; as chromic acid, ferric chloride. Guaiacum resin, fused with caustic potash, yields protocatechuic acid.

guâ-ân, s. [The Guiana name of the bird.]

Ornith.: The genus Penelope, which belongs to the family Craciidæ (Curassows). [PENELOPE.]

†guâ-næ (u as w), s. The same as IGUANA (q. v.).

guâ-na-cô (u as w), s. [Sp. American.]

Zool.: Auchenia guanaco, a llama, believed by many to be the original stock from which the domesticated animal of that name was derived. The guanaco inhabits the chain of the Andes to their most southerly point.

fâte, fât, fâre, amidst, whât, fâll, father; wê, wêt, hêre, camêl, hêr, thêre; plne, pît, sire, sîr, marine; gô, pôl, or. wôre, wôlf, wôrck, whô, sôn; mûte, cûb, cûre, unite, cûr, râle, fûll; trý, sýrian. æ, œ = é; ey = â. qu = kw.

guān-ā-mide (u as w), s. [Eng. guan(o), and amine.]

Chem.: $C_2H_5N_3O$. Aceto-guanamide. Obtained by heating one part of aceto-guanamine with two parts of concentrated sulphuric acid to 150°. The cold solution is treated with alcohol, the precipitate dissolved in water, and reprecipitated by lead acetate, and the lead salt decomposed by H-S. Guanamide crystallizes out of alcohol in small rhombic needles, easily soluble in water, acids, and alkalies, slightly soluble in alcohol.

guān-ā-mines (u as w), s. pl. [Eng. guan(o), and amines.]

Chem.: Bases obtained by heating the fatty acid salts of guanidine to from 220° to 230°. Guanamine, $C_2H_5N_3$, or Formoguanamine, obtained by heating guanidine formate to 200°. $3(C_2H_5N_3HCO\cdot OH = C_2H_5N_3 + 4NH_3 + CO_2 + 2CO + 2H_2O)$. The fused mass is mixed with an equal volume of cold water filtered, the residue dissolved in small quantities in hot water, and precipitated with a concentrated solution of oxalic acid. The oxalate is decomposed by caustic soda, which throws down the base in white crystalline needles, melting above 350°, which are easily soluble in boiling water, and slightly soluble in alcohol. Aceto-guanamine is obtained by heating dry guanidine acetate to 230°. It melts at 265°, and is soluble in alcohol and in hot water. This substance was formerly called guanamine.

guān-ī-dine (u as w), s. [Eng., &c., guan(in), and idine.]

Chem.: CH_5N_3 . An organic amine, obtained by the action of potassium chlorate and hydrochloric acid on guanin. $C_2H_5N_3O + H_2O + O_3 = CH_5N_3 + CO_2 + C_2H_2N_2O_3$, parabanic acid; by heating biuret and hydrochloric acid gas in a sealed tube to 170°; by the action of alcoholic ammonia on chloropirac at 100°. $C(NO_2)(Cl)_3 + 7NH_3 = CH_5N_3 + 3NH_2HCl + NH_2HNO_2$; also by the action of aqueous ammonia on ethyl orthocarbonate at 150°. $C(OC_2H_5)_4 + 3NH_3 = CH_5N_3 + 4C_2H_5OH$; by heating ammonium chloride with cyanamide in an alcoholic solution to 100°, $NH_4Cl + CN\cdot NH_2 = CH_5N_3 + HCl$. Guanidine is best obtained by preparing the sulphate from the carbonate, and then removing the sulphuric acid by baryta water. Guanidine forms colorless deliquescent crystals, which are very soluble in alcohol and in water. The solution absorbs carbonic acid from the air. When guanidine is boiled with baryta water, it is converted into ammonia and urea. By the action of concentrated acids on alkalies, it is decomposed into CO_2 and NH_3 .

guanidine-carbonate, s.

Chem.: $2CH_5N_3H_2CO_3$. Obtained by boiling 100 parts of guanidine-sulphocyanate with fifty-eight parts of K_2CO_3 , dissolved in a very small quantity of water. The carbonate is then precipitated by alcohol, and recrystallized out of boiling water.

guanidine-nitrate, s.

Chem.: $CH_5N_3HNO_3$. Obtained by boiling guanidine-sulphocyanate with ammonium nitrate, and concentrating the solution, when guanidine-nitrate, which is only slightly soluble in cold water, crystallizes out in large plates.

guanidine-sulphocyanate, s.

Chem.: CH_5N_3HCNS . This salt is easily prepared by heating ammonium sulphocyanate to between 180° and 190° for twenty hours, in a flask over a flame, with a long tube to carry off the vapors. It is then dissolved in its own weight of cold water, filtered, and concentrated by evaporation on a water bath. On cooling, it deposits crystals of guanidine-sulphocyanate, which melt at 118°.

Substitution compounds of guanidine are obtained by heating cyanamide with the hydrochlorates of primary amines, $CN\cdot NH_2 + NH_2CH_2HCl = CN_2H_4(CH_2)HCl$. Methyl-guanidine is also obtained by boiling creatine with mercuric oxide and water. Triethyl-guanidine, $CN_2H_2(C_2H_5)_3$, is obtained by boiling an alcoholic solution of diethyl-thio-carbamide and ethylamine with mercuric oxide. Diphenyl-guanidine is obtained by the action of gaseous cyanogen chloride on dry aniline, and also by boiling cyananilide with aniline hydrochlorate. It crystallizes in needles, which melt at 147°.

guan-īf-ēr-ōus (u as w), a. [Eng. guano, and Lat. fero=to produce.] Producing guano.

guā-nine (u as w), s. [Eng., &c., guan(o), and ine.]

Chem.: $C_5H_5N_3O$. It exists in the pancreatic juice of mammalia and in the excrement of the spider. It is prepared by boiling Peruvian guano with milk of lime till the liquid is no longer colored brown. The residue, containing guanine and uric acid, is boiled with a solution of sodium carbonate and filtered, and then sodium acetate is added, and hydrochloric acid added till the solution is strongly acid. The guanine is precipitated, and purified by dissolving in hot nitric acid and precipitating by ammonia. Guanine is an amorphous powder, insoluble in water, alcohol, and ether. Soluble in excess of concentrated ammonia. It forms crystalline salts with acids. By the action of nitrous acid it is converted into xanthin. Guanine, when evaporated with fuming nitric acid on a piece of platinum foil, leaves a yellow residue; this, when treated with caustic soda, gives a red color, which, on being heated, becomes a purple-red.

gua-nite (u as w), s. [Peruvian guano, and suff. -ite (Min.) (q. v.).]

Min.: The same as STREUVITE (q. v.).

gua-nō (u as w), s. [Peruvian Spanish=the droppings of sea-fowl.]

1. Min.: A grayish-white, yellowish, dark brown, or reddish substance, classed by Dana as a mineral, which he places among his Anhydrous Phosphates and Sulphates. It is a bone phosphate of lime or osteolite with some impurities. Its luster on a fresh fracture is resinous; its structure often granular or oolitic. Found in islands off the Peruvian and other South American coasts, also in those off the coast of Africa and elsewhere. Guano from different localities has been differently named. It has been called Pyroclaste, Pyroguanite, Sombrite, and Glaubapatite (q. v.).

2. Geol.: Guano is formed by the droppings of multitudinous birds, in secluded places where they have been undisturbed for ages. If, in any locality, little rain falls, this tends to the rapid accumulation of guano. The dried bodies of the birds are often found in it.

3. Comm.: Immense quantities of guano are imported from the islands off the coast of Peru, it being an exceedingly valuable manure.

gua-nō (u as w), v. t. [GUANO, s.] To manure or dress with guano.

gua-rā (u as w), s. [Brazilian.]

Ornith.: Ibis rubra, the Scarlet Ibis of this country. [IBIS.]

gua-ra-cha (u as w), s. [Sp.]

Music: A lively Spanish dance in three-eighths or three-quarter time, usually accompanied on the guitar by the dancer himself.

guā-rā-nā (u as w), s. [A Brazilian Indian word.]

Phar.: The powdered seeds of Paullinia sorbilis, from Brazil. An infusion is used instead of coffee in South America. Guarana contains five per cent. of theine.

guarana-bread, s. Bread made by the Brazilian Indians from guarana. It is used in Brazil as a stomachic, a febrifuge, and an aphrodisiac.

The sacred storehouse of his predecessors,

And guardian of their bones."

Shakesp.: Macbeth, ii. 4.

II. Law: One who has the charge, custody, and supervision of any person not legally capable of managing his own affairs.

"Of the several species of guardians, the first are guardians by nature—viz., the father and (in some cases) the mother of the child. This guardianship is a mere personal right in the father or other ancestor to the custody of the person of the infant, until he or she attains twenty-one years of age. For if an estate be left to an infant, the father is by common law the guardian, and must account to his child for the profits. There are also guardians for nurture, which are the father, or, if he be dead, the mother, till the infant attains the age of fourteen years; a guardianship which, like that by nature, has no reference to the infant's property, but relates merely to his person."—Blackstone: Commentaries, bk. i., ch. 13.

B. As adj.: Guarding, watching, defending; acting as a guardian or protector, especially in the phrase, guardian angel.

"No father's guardian hand my youth maintained."

be either guardian in law or jure magistratus, as the archbishop is of any diocese within his province; or guardian by delegation, as he whom the archbishop or vicar-general doth for the time deputate. (Cowel.)

*3. Guardian of the temporalities: A person to whom the temporal jurisdiction and the profits of a vacant see are committed.

guardian-angel, s.

1. Lit. & Theol.: It is a pious belief (q. v.) but not an article of faith in the Latin and Greek Churches that to every individual of the human race there is assigned at birth an angel as guardian and protector. These duties are fulfilled by warding off temptations that may injure the person's spiritual condition, or by instilling into the soul wise counsels and holy warnings. Theologians deduce this belief immediately from Matt. xviii. 10, and the Fathers of the Church strongly inculcate it, and in the Lives of the Saints instances are given of the active interference of guardian-angels. The belief is shared by Anglican High Churchmen. Bishop Bull (Sermons (ed. 1714), ii. 506) speaks of the belief that every Christian has a guardian-angel as "highly probable." Smith (Dict. of Bible, s. v. Angel) says that the notion of special guardian-angels watching over individuals is consistent with the text in Matthew, though not necessarily to be deduced therefrom. He adds that the existence of the belief in the early Church is shown from Acts xii. 5. The Roman Church celebrates the Feast of Guardian Angels on October 2d. It is a double. [GUARDIAN-SPIRIT.]

"Whence is taken the name of guardian-angels? From the following words of Holy Scripture: He shall give his angels charge over thee to guard thee in all thy ways (Ps. xci. 11)."—Schaff: Creed of the Greek and Latin Churches, p. 462.

2. Fig.: A protector, a defender.

Compar. Relig.: Probably the idea of guardian-spirits had its origin in a low form of Animism—that each person is double, that when he dies his other self, whether remaining near at hand or gone far away, may return, and continue capable of injuring his enemies and aiding his friends. It finds expression in some form in all primitive religions, and in many which have reached a higher stage of development. The Australian native believes that when a warrior kills his first foe the spirit of the slain enters the body of the slayer, and becomes his guardian; in Tasmania a native has been heard to ascribe his deliverance from danger to the care of his deceased father's spirit; and the most important religious rite of a North American Indian is to obtain a patron genius. In Asia, in Africa, and among the Indians of South America, the belief in guardian-spirits obtains, as it did formerly among the Aryans of Northern Europe. But it is in classic paganism that it appeals to us most gracefully. Menander tells us of the good mystagogue given to every man at his birth, and the Demon of Socrates has quite a bibliography of his own, beginning with Plato and ending with Cardinal Manning. In Roman times the guardian-spirit was represented as a lar among the household gods, and specially venerated on the anniversary of the birth of the guarded one, with festive rites. There are few more touching passages in Roman poetry than those in which Ovid describes his feelings in exile on the recurrence of the days sacred to his own and to his wife's guardian-spirits. [GUARDIAN-ANGEL.]

guard-l-an-age (u silent; age as ig), s. [Eng. guardian; -age.] Guardianship, protection, care.

"During the time of my nonage (whiles I was under his guardianship), he bare himself, not only valiant, but also true and faithful unto me."—P. Holland: Livius, p. 1,093.

The bark and very bitter seeds of Guilandina bonduc, an Indian tree, when pounded small and mixed with castor oil, form a valuable external application in incipient hydrocele, and the leaves fried with a little castor oil, act as a discutient in hernia humeralis. The seeds, called Bonduc or Nickernuts, are hard and smooth; they are used in the East for rosaries, necklaces, &c.

guild, *gild, *gilde, *gyeld, *gyylde, *gylde, *yilde, s. [A. S. gild=a payment; gegyldscipe=a guild; gegilda=a member of a guild; gieldan, gyldan=to pay (Eng. yield); cogn. with Dut. gild=a guild or company; Icel. gildi=payment; Goth. gild=tribute-money; Ger. gilde=a guild.]

1. Ordinary Language:

1. A society or corporation belonging to the same class, trade, or pursuits, combined for mutual aid and protection of their interests.

"It was originally governed by a guild and guild-master; which was the origin of corporations, and took rise before the time of the Conquest; the name being Saxon, signifying a fraternity, which unites and flings its effects into a common stock, and is derived from gildan, to pay. A guild was a public feast, to commemorate the time of the institution; and the guild-hall the place in which the fraternity assembled."—Pennant: Journey from Chester; Lichfield.

2. A guildhall.

3. A company or fellowship of any kind; an association.

"He was so deserted,

Not to be called into their guild."

Ben Jonson: Masques: Chloridia.

II. Hist.: The essential principle of the guild is the banding together for mutual help, enjoyment, and encouragement. Some German scholars find the origin of guilds in the sacrificial assemblies of the Teutonic tribes; Wilda, Brentano, and others see in the family the germ from which it was developed; others again maintain that guilds have sprung from the Roman collegia. More than 2,000 years ago the Greeks had their eranoi and thiasoi, and Numa is said to have encouraged the formation of craft guilds, of which Plutarch enumerates nine.

guild-brother, s. A fellow-member of a guild.
guild-a-ble, a. [Eng. guild; -able.] Liable to a tax.

guild-ér, *gild-er, *gild-ern, s. [A corrupt of Dut. & Ger. gilden=a florin, as if a coin of gueders or gelders.] A coin current in Holland and worth twenty stivers, or about forty cents.

"One projector was for coining guilders; another for coining dollars."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xxi.

guild-háll, *gyle-halle, s. [Eng. guild, and hall.] A hall where a guild or corporation meets; a townhall; a corporation-hall; specif., the townhall of London, England.

guild-rý, s. [Eng. guild; -ry.] A guild; the members of a guild. (Scotch.) Mine own would not be dry."

Byron: Childe Harold, i. 13.

guile-léss-lý, adv. [Eng. guileless; -ly.] In a guileless, honest, sincere, or open manner; without deceit or duplicity.

guile-léss-néss, s. [Eng. guileless; -ness.] The quality or state of being guileless; freedom from guile or duplicity.

guil-ér, s. [Eng. guil(e); -er.] One who deceives, deludes, or betrays by guile.

"And now by fortune, was arrived here,

Where those two guilers with Malbecco were."

Spenser: F. Q., III. x. 37.

guil-l-él-má, s. [Named after Caroline Wilhelmine, Queen of Maximilian I., King of Bavaria.]

Bot.: A genus of Palms, tribe Cocceae, and the spiny division of them. The leaves are pinnate; the fruit, which is egg-shaped, has but one seed. Three species are known—Guilielma speciosa is the Peach-palm of Venezuela and Guiana. It is from sixty to eighty feet high, and is cultivated along the Amazon and the Rio Negro. The natives eat the fleshy portions of the fruit boiled or roasted. The taste is like that of potatoes. Sometimes molasses is added. When fermented in water they form a beverage, while meal obtained from them is baked into cakes.

guil-l-é-mét, s. [Fr., from the name of the inventor.]

Print.: A quotation mark; a mark used to inclose a quotation (' ' " ").

guil-l-é-mót, s. [Fr.]

Ornith.: Uria, a genus of natatorial birds placed under the family Alcidae. The bill is moderate and slender, the frontal planes advancing far upon the nostrils, but divided by the culmen; the tail short, the wings pointed, the feet short, slender, and three-toed. The proper habitat of the guillemot is amid the rocks and ice-caverns of the Arctic Ocean. They deposit their solitary egg on a ledge of rock, and the young, when hatched, tumble into the sea, and swim and dive with great facility, feeding on small fish and crustaceans.

guil-l-é-vát, *gyle-fat, *gyle-vat, s. [French guiller=to ferment, and English vat (q. v.).] A vat used in brewing for fermenting wort.

guil-lôche, s. [Fr., from the name of the inventor or introducer.]

Arch.: An ornament of intertwisted bands or interlaced cords, which is made continuous as a fascia.

guil-lô-tine, s. [Fr.]

1. An apparatus for beheading criminals with a single blow, used by the French Government for executing criminals. A form of it was in use in the Middle Ages, but, being improved and re-introduced by Dr. Guillotin at the time of the first French Revolution, it received its present name after him. The following description will explain the apparatus and its mode of use: On a platform about twelve feet square, and seven feet above the ground, are erected the two upright posts between which is suspended the ax. They somewhat resemble a narrow gallows with not more than a foot between the posts. The ax, which is not unlike a hay-knife, though much heavier and broader, is drawn up to the top of the posts, between which it runs in grooves, and is held suspended by a loop in the halcyards, passed over a button at the bottom. The edge of the ax is diagonal, so as to make a draw cut, giving it a fearful power and certainty in severing a human neck. On the center of the platform stands a frame or large inverted box, much resembling a soldier's arm-chest, about six feet long and two and a half feet wide and high. One end of this abuts upon the upright posts; at the other end is a small truck having a strap and buckle by which the culprit is secured. He is advanced with his breast against the truck, to which his body is strapped, and tilted down, truck and all, upon his face; the truck, moving upon small wheels in grooves on the top of the chest, is run rapidly forward until the neck comes under the knife. The rope is unhooked from the button, the ax falls with a thud, the head drops into a basket, and the body is unstrapped and rolled into a large basket alongside. It is a vulgar error to suppose that Dr. Guillotin perished by the machine of his own invention, as he lived till 1814, and founded the Academy of Medicine. [MAIDEN.]

Guillotine.

2. A guillotine-cutter (q. v.).

bóil, bōy; pōút, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f.

Guimet's ultramarine, s. [Or French Ultramarine.] A factitious pigment of a fine azure blue color—a compound of alumina, soda, sulphur, and a trace of iron, offered as a useful substitute for the more costly ultramarine. It is a valuable addition to the palette, being transparent and durable.

guin-êa, Guin-êa, s. & a. [From a native West African word (?).]

A. As substantive:

1. Geog. (of the form Guinea): A territory on the West African coast between Cape Verge, in lat. 10° 20' N., and Cape Negro, in lat. 15° 41' S.

II. Ord. Lang. (of the form Guinea):

1. A gold coin, formerly current in Great Britain. By a proclamation issued December 22, 1717, the guinea was declared current at 21s. sterling. Its true value, as derived from the market values of gold and silver at that time was 20s. 8d., about $4.06. At present there is no English coin so called, but the fashion still prevails of quoting prices of some things in guineas, and subscriptions are frequently recorded in the same denomination.

"The guinea, so called from the Guinea gold out of which it was first struck, was proclaimed in 1663, and to go for 20s.; but it never went for less than 21s., by tacit and universal consent."—Pinkerton: On Medals, vol. ii., § 19.

2. A sum of money equivalent to a guinea; as, The price was 1,000 guineas.

3. A gold piece coined in Egypt, value 100 piasters.

B. As adj.: Of, belonging to, native to, or derived from Guinea. (See the compounds.)

Guinea-corn, s. Bot.: Sorghum vulgare. Called also millet (q. v.).

Guinea-current, s. Hydrol. & Geog.: A current running from the north into the Bight or Bay of Benin, on the Guinea coast of Africa. (Lyell.)

guinea-fowl, s. Ornith.: The genus Numida, of which several species are found wild in Africa. The Common Guinea-fowl, or hen, is Numida meleagris. It has slate-colored plumage covered all over with round white spots. In its native haunts in Africa it lives in large flocks, frequenting by preference marshy situations. It is excellent eating, and has been introduced into barn-yards, where, however, it is unpleasantly noisy, perpetually uttering a cry like the syllables ca-mac, ca-mac. Called also the Guinea Pintado.

Guinea-grains, s. pl. Phar.: [GRAINS OF PARADISE.]

Guinea-grass, s. Bot.: Panicum jumentorum, or maximum. It is a native of Western Africa, whence it has been introduced into the warmer parts of this country, where it is cultivated for fodder.

guinea-hen, ginny-hen, s. 1. Lit.: A guinea-fowl (q. v.).

"The natives of those islands call [them] Gallena Pintada, or the painted hen; but in Jamaica, where I have seen also those birds in the dry savannas and woods (for they love to run about in such places), they are called guinea-hens."—Dampier: Voyages (an. 1690).

*2. Fig.: A prostitute, a courtesan. "Ere I would drown myself for the love of a guinea-hen I would change my humanity with a baboon."—Shakespeare: Othello, i. 3.

(1) Guinea-hen flower: Bot.: Fritillaria meleagris.

(2) Guinea-hen weed: Bot.: Peliveria alliacea. Its English name is given because guinea-hens are said to be very fond of it. It grows wild in the savannas and woods in the West Indies, and is so acrid as to blister the tongue and affect the milk of cattle which eat it.

Guinea-peach, s. Bot.: Sarcocephalus esculentus, a native of Sierra Leone.

Guinea-pepper, s. I. Botany:

1 & 2. Amomum grana Paradisi and A. grandiflorum, aromatic plants growing in Western Africa, and used for the same purpose as cardamoms. (Eng. Cyclop.)

3. Habzelia æthiopica.

4. Capsicum annuum.

II. Food products: The same as CAYENNE-PEPPER (q. v.). (Treas. of Bot.)

guinea-pig, s. 1. Lit. & Zool.: Cavia aparea. A domestic animal, usually colored white, black, and orange. It is wild in Brazil, Paraguay, &c., and in that state is orange and black above and dull yellow beneath.

2. Figuratively: (1) A term of reproach. (Smollett: Roderick Random, ch. xxiv.)

(2) A name jocosely given to a person acting as a substitute, or as a director of a public company, performing duties for which the fee is a guinea. (English.)

"What would be the use, for instance, of having M. P.'s as guinea-pigs if they were disqualified by the mere fact of sitting on a board from furthering the interests of their companies in Parliament?"—Pall Mall Gazette.

Guinea-plum, s. Bot.: Parinarium excelsum, a plant of the order Chrysobalanaceæ, from Sierra Leone. It is not much esteemed. Called also Rough-skin.

Guinea-ship, s. Zool.: One of the names given by sailors to a floating Medusa—Physalia pelagica.

Guinea-worm, s. Zool.: Filaria medinensis—a whitish or dark-brown worm, one of the human Entozoa, parasitic generally in the feet, sometimes in the scrotum, and rarely beneath the tunica conjunctiva of the eye. Its length is from six inches to five, eight, or twelve feet; its thickness from half to two-thirds of a line. It is endemic in the tropical regions of Asia and Africa, especially in Upper Egypt, Abyssinia, and Guinea. (Owen, &c.)

guin-i-âd (u as w), s. [GWYNIAD.]

gui-pûre, s. [Fr.]

1. A kind of lace in imitation of the antique. Patterns are cut out of cambric to form the flowers and heavy parts; the open parts are made of stitches.

2. A kind of gimp.

guise, gise, guyse, gyse, guize, s. [Fr. guise, from O. H. Ger. wise (M. H. Ger. weise: Ger. weise)=a way, a guise, a manner; Sp., Port., & Ital. guisa; cogn. with A. S. wise=manner, wise.]

*1. Manner, way, wise, fashion, style. "He servyd hym on the newe gyse."—Tyramour, 1, 560.

2. External appearance, dress, habit, garb. "In homely guise, as nature bade, His simple song the Borderer said."—Scott: Lay of the Last Minstrel, vi. 10.

3. External show or covering; cover, cloak, pretense; as, This was done under the guise of religion.

*4. Manner, mien; cast of behavior or conduct. "By their guise Just men they seem."—Milton: P. L., xl. 576.

*5. Custom, practice, manner. "But it is not their guise to looke on the order of any text, but as they find it in their doctors so alledge they it, and so vnderstand it."—Tyndal: Works, p. 168.

"The Venetian admiral withdrew himself farther off from the island Corfu, into the gulf of the Adriatic."—Knolles: History of the Turks.

2. Mining: A large deposit of ore in a lode.

* Gulf of the dead: [RIVER OF DEATH.]

gulf-indented, a. Having the line of coast broken by gulfs or bays.

Gulf Stream, s.

Hydrol., Geog., &c.: One of the leading currents in the ocean. As all these currents are so continuous as to be really but one current connected at the two ends, so that the movement of one part is the movement of all, the Gulf Stream cannot strictly be said to begin anywhere. It is due to the reflux of the equatorial current. The condensation and superheating of the last-named current takes place mainly in the Caribbean Sea and the Gulf of Mexico, whence arises the name Gulf Stream. Its temperature there is about 50°. It emerges as a defined hot current through the Straits of Florida, and courses in a northeasterly direction at a little distance from the coast of this country, so affecting the Bermudas as to make their climate semi-tropical. Between these islands and Halifax the Gulf Stream is about sixty miles broad, one hundred fathoms deep, and moves at the rate of three knots an hour. It is of a deep blue color, in marked contrast to the dull green of the Arctic reflux. The Gulf Stream moves in a northeasterly direction toward Europe. It is generally believed to be through its influence that the western coast of the European continent is so much milder than the corresponding latitudes of America.

"Our beneficial ameliorator, the Gulf-stream."—Sir Wyville Thomson: Voyage of the Challenger, i. 121.

gulf-weed, s.

1. Bot.: An algal, Sargassum bacciferum, floating in the Atlantic within an area of more than 250,000 square miles between 20° and 45° N. latitude, and 19° and 47° W. longitude, or about seven times the extent of France. It is from being found chiefly in the Gulf Stream that it is called gulf-weed. Columbus encountered the gulf-weed about 100 miles west of the Azores, and on seeing it feared that his ships would run upon a shoal.

"The wandering islands of gulf-weed."—Sir C. Wyville Thomson: Voyage of the Challenger, i. 120.

2. Geol.: Prof. Edward Forbes believed that the position of the gulf-weed marked where an ancient coast-line of the Lusitanian province existed on which it had originally grown. Though species of Sargassum have occasionally been found rooted on particular shores, the Sargassum bacciferum never has been so found. It may perhaps be an abnormal variety of Sargassum vulgare. It flourishes in its present position, propagating itself by breakage, the vessels which it produces not being organs of fructification, but only air vesicles. (S. P. Woodward.)

Gulf-weed banks: The banks where gulf-weed grows. [GULF-WEED.]

*gūlf, *gūlph, v. t. & i. [GULF, s.]

A. Transitive:

1. To swallow up; to engulf; to overwhelm as in a whirlpool.

B. Intransitive:

1. To flow like a gulf.

"And deep Charybdis gulphing in and out."
Spenser: Virgil's Gnat, 542.

2. To swallow up; to overwhelm; to drown.

"The whirlpool's gulphing stream."
Scott: Bridal of Triermain, ii. 24.

gūlf-ÿ, *gūlph-ÿ, a. [Eng. gulf; -ÿ.] Full of gulfs, whirlpools, and eddies.

"And gulphy Simois, rolling to the main."

Pope: Homer's Iliad xii. 21.

gūl-gūl, s. A cement used for covering the bottoms of ships to prevent the boring of worms. It is manufactured in India, and is made from a mixture of pulverized sea shells and oil.

gūll (1), *gūl (1), s. [Corn. gullan; Welsh gwyllan; Bret. gwelan.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

* (1) An unfledged nestling.

"That ungentle gull, the cuckoo's bird."
Shakesp.: Henry IV., v. 1.

(2) In the same sense as II. 1.

"Gulls are found in great plenty in every place."—Goldsmith: Hist. of Anim. Nat., pt. iii., bk. vii., ch. vi.

2. Figuratively:

(1) One who is easily gulled or cheated; a simpleton, a dupe.

"At first I will express at full,
Who is a true and perfect gull indeed."

Str J. Davis: Epiq. 2.

* (2) One who has been cheated, defrauded, or stripped.

"For I do fear
Lord Timon will be left a naked gull."

Shakesp.: Timon of Athens, ii. 1.

* (3) A cheat, a fraud, a trick.

"I should think this a gull, but that the white-bearded fellow speaks it."—Shakesp.: Much Ado About Nothing, ii. 3.

II. Zoölogy:

1. Sing.: The English name of Larus, a genus of natatorial birds. They are widely distributed along the shores of the several seas and oceans, feeding voraciously on fish, or at certain times going some distance inland to look after worms in plowed fields. They breed on rocky headlands, making a rude nest, in which they lay from two to four eggs.

2. Plural:

(1) The sub-family Larinæ, one of three into which the family Laridæ is divided. It contains the genus Lestris (Skua), in addition to the gulls proper.

(2) The family Laridæ. It comprehends not only the gulls, but the terns, petrels, &c.

*gūll (2), *gūl (2), *gūlle, s. [Lat. gula=the throat.] [GULLET.] A gulf, an eddy, a whirlpool.

gūll (1), v. t. [GULL (1), s.] To cheat, to trick, to deceive, to dupe, to take in.

"Be gulled no longer, for you'll find it true,
They have no more religion, faith—than you."
Dryden: Prod. to Amboyna.

*gūll (2), v. t. [GULL (2), s.] To swallow up or in.

*gūll-age (age as ÿ), s. [Eng. gull; -age.] The act of duping or tricking; the state of being gulled.

"Had you no quirk
To avoid gullage, sir, by such a creature?"
Ben Jonson.

*gūll-catch-ër, s. [English gull, and catcher.] One who gulls or catches simple or silly people; a trickster; a guller.

"Here comes my noble gullcatcher."
Shakesp.: Twelfth Night, ii. 5.

*gūll-ër, s. [Eng. gull; -er.] A trickster; a gullcatcher; a cheat.

*gūll-ër-ÿ, s. [Eng. gull; -ery.]

1. A pond or place for breeding or keeping gulls.
"Two other instances of such inland gulleries exist in England."—E. Trollope: Sleaford (1872), p. 58.

2. Cheating; fraud; trickery.

"The sweet deception and gullery of their own corrupted fancy."—H. More: Defence of Moral Cabbala, ch. iii.

gūl-lët, *gol-et, *gol-ett, s. [Fr. goulet, dimin. of O. Fr. gole, goule (Fr. gueule), from Lat. gula=the throat.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The throat; the passage in the neck through which the food passes into the stomach; the esophagus.

"Out of the harde bones knocken they
The marry, for they casten nought away,
That may go thurgh the gullet soft and sote."
Chaucer: C. T., 12,477.

2. A channel for water.

"The Euxine sea and the Mediterranean, small gullets, if compared with the ocean."—Heylyn: Cosmographie.

3. A gore in a shirt.

II. Technically:

1. Civ. Eng.: A narrow working cutting made in the formation of an excavation, and used as a means of laying down a pair of rails to bring the dirt-cars to the bank.

2. Harness: The lower end of a horse-collar, around which passes the choke-strap, and the breast-strap which supports the pole of a carriage.

3. Saws: A hollow cut away in front of each saw-tooth, in continuation of the face, on alternate sides of the blade. Such saws are known as gullet-saws or brier-tooth saws. The gullet is adapted to allow the saw to be sharpened by a round or half-round file, by which the face of the tooth becomes concave when viewed edgewise, and acquires a thin cutting edge. The increased curvilinear space also allows more room for the sawdust. [GULLET-SAW.]

gullet-saw, s. A saw having a hollow cut-away in front of each tooth in continuation of the face and on alternate sides of the blade. Called also a brier-tooth saw.

bōll, bōy; pōut, jōwī; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, ag; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f.
-cian, -tian = shān. -tion, -sion = shūn; -tion, -sion = zhūn. -tious, -cious, -sious = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl.

gullet-tooth, s. A form of saw-tooth. [GULLET-SAW.]

gŭl-lēt-lāg, s. [Eng. gullet; -ing.]

Rail, Eng.: In excavating for railroads, a system of carrying the work forward in a series of steps upon which different gangs of men are at work with pick, shovel, and wheelbarrow, assisted by temporary lines of rail and dumping-wagons if the work be sufficiently extensive. Also called notching.

gulleting-press, s. A press for punching or gulleting saw-blades, gumming worn saws, or paring down or retoothing broken saws. The punch is socketed in the end of a plunger whose upper portion is a double-threaded screw crowned by a fly-handle.

gŭl-leŷ, s. [GULLY.]

gŭl-li-bil-i-tŷ, s. [Eng. gullible; -ity.] The quality or state of being gullible; easy credulity.

gŭl-li-ble, a. [Eng. gull; -able.] That may or can be easily gulled, cheated, or duped; very credulous.

gŭl-liēd, a. [Eng. gully; -ed.] Full of or containing gullies; channeled, furrowed.

gŭl-liŷ, a. [Eng. gull; -ish.] Like a gull; foolish; stupid; simple.

"They have most part some gullish humor or other, by which they are led."—Burton: Anatomy of Melancholy; To the Reader.

gŭl-liŷ-nēss, s. [Eng. gullish; -ness.] The quality or state of being gullish; silliness, stupidity, gullibility.

gŭl-lŷ (1), s. [Etym. doubtful.] (See extract.)

"Fair gullies, which are little haunch-backed demiknives, the iron tool whereof is two inches long, and the wooden handle one inch thick and three inches in length."—Urguhart: Rabelais, bk. i., ch. xviii.

gŭl-lŷ (2), gŭl-leŷ, s. [Fr. goulet.] [GULLET.]

1. A channel or hollow worn in the earth by water; a ditch, a dike, a gutter.

"Parts of the shore interrupted by small valleys and gullies."—Cook: Third Voyage, bk. iv., ch. iv.

2. The tram-plates or rails laid for the use of tram-wagons.

gŭl-lŷ, v. t. & i. [GULLEY (2), s.]

A. Trans.: To wear away or into a hollow or channel.

B. Intrans.: To run with noise.

gŭl-lŷ-gŭt, s. [Eng. gull (2), v., and gut.] A glutton, a gormandizer.

gŭl-lŷ-hŏle, s. [Eng. gully (2), s., and hole.] The hole or opening through which gutters and drains empty themselves into a sewer.

gŭl-lŷ, s. [Lat.=a gormandizer, an epicure.]

Zool.: A genus of plantigrade carnivorous mammals, family Melidae (Badgers). Guloliscus is the glutton (q. v.), called also the wolverine. There are other species, some zoologists including among them also the Grison (q. v.).

gŭ-lŷs-i-tŷ, s. [Latin gulosus = gluttonous, from gulo = a glutton.] Gluttony, voracity, greediness, ravenousness.

"Erring in gulosity, or superfluity of meats."—Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. iv., ch. ix.

gŭlp, v. t. & i. [Dut. gulpen = to swallow eagerly; O. Dut. golpen, gulpen = to quaff, from gulf = a wave; O. Dan. golpe = a gulf; Dan. gulpe = to disgorge. Thus gulf is only a variant of gulf or gulph.] [GULF.]

A. Transitive:

1. Literally:

1. To swallow eagerly or in large draughts.

"He does not swallow, but he gulps it down."—Couper: Conversation, 340.

2. To inhale eagerly.

"Then thy spruce citizen, washed artisan, And snug apprentice gulp the weekly air."—Byron: Childe Harold, l. 69.

II. Fig.: To swallow, to believe, to take in eagerly.

"Such jokes as these the old man not only took in good part, but glibly gulped down the whole narrative."—Fielding: Voyage to Lisbon, July 24, 1754.

B. Intrans.: To swallow.

"See them puff off the froth and gulp amain, While with dry tongue I lick my lips in vain."—Gay: Trivia, l. 191.

¶ To gulp up: To disgorge; to eject from the stomach.

gŭlp, s. [GULP, v.]

1. The act of swallowing eagerly or in large draughts.

2. A large mouthful; as much as can be swallowed at once.

"As oft as he can catch a gulp of air, And peep above the seas, he names the fair."—Dryden: Ovid; Metamorphoses x.

3. The act of disgorging.

gŭl-rāv-age (age as ig), s. [GILRAVAGE.]

gŭ-lŭn-çā, gā-lŭn-çā, s. [Some Indian languages.]

Pharm.: An Indian febrifuge prepared, according to Dr. Wright, from the bruised stems of Tinospora verrucosa, and T. cordifolia, menispermaceous plants.

gŭ-lŷ, a. [Eng. gule (s); -y.] Pertaining to or resembling gules; red in color.

"The horrid standard of those fatal guly dragons."—Milton: Reform in England, bk. ii.

gŭm (1), gome, gomme (1), goom, s. [A. S. gōma = the palate, the jaws; cogn. with Sw. gom; Dan. gane; Icel. góm; O. H. Ger. guomo; Ger. gaumen = the palate.]

1. Anat.: The soft covering of the dental arches. The gums consist of a dense connective tissue, covered by a scaly and stratified epithelium.

"I find upon inquiry, that the person whose tooth had been placed in my gums, was laboring under a complication of the filthiest of diseases, and that the tooth inoculated them all on me."—Knox: Winter Evenings, Even. 58.

2. Fig.: Chatter, talk.

"There's no occasion to bowss out so much unnecessary gum."—Smollett: Peregrine Pickle, ch. xiv.

gum-boil, s. A boil or small abscess on the gums.

gum-rash, s. A rash or papular eruption frequent in children; red gums.

gŭm (2), gomme (2), gumme, s. [Fr. gomme, from Lat. gummi; Gr. kommi = gum; Sp. goma; Port. & Ital. gomma.]

1. Bot.: Gum is a vegetable secretion, sometimes occurring in intercellular spaces, formed by the separation of the walls of cells. It is viscid, but not oily.

2. Chem.: The most typical kind of gum is Gum-arabic, which is the exudation from the stems of several species of acacia growing in Egypt and Arabia. [GUM-ARABIC.]

"Drop tears as fast as the Arabian trees Their medicinal gum."—Shakespeare: Othello, v. 2.

3. Pharm.: Gum is used as a demulcent to allay the irritation of the mucous membrane, also for suspending heavy powders, as nitrate of bismuth, when they are given in a liquid.

4. The same as GUMMING (q. v.).

¶ (1) Chewing-gum: Gum from the spruce tree is extensively used as a confection, and is commonly called chewing-gum. The term chewing gum is also applied to other kinds of gum prepared and sold as a confection.

(2) Doctor's gum is said to be furnished by Rhus metopium, a Jamaica plant, to which, as well as to some other plants, Hog gum has been attributed. Other compounds, in which gum is the last word, will be found scattered through the book.

Zool.: A name formed from "the animal of the gum," a rendering of the term applied by the Moors to Galago senegalensis, a lemur said to feed on gum in three forests consisting of the trees producing gum-senegal in the Sahara. (Griffith's Cuvier.)

gum-animl, s.

Bot., Chem., & Comm.: A gum called in India copal, which is derived from a tree, Vateria indica. It is obtained by cutting a notch in the tree sloping inward and downward; the resin collects at the wound, and soon hardens. It is called in the south of India Piney Dammara. It is an excellent varnish. On the Malabar coast it is made into candles. (Wright & Co.)

gum-arabic, s.

1. Bot. & Comm.: A gum obtained from the Acacia arabica, which grows abundantly in India and Arabia. [ACACIA.] It is yielded also by A. speciosa in India, A. nilotica and A. seyal in Arabia, A. tortilis and A. ehrenbergiana in tropical Africa, A. mollissima and A. affinis supply a similar gum in Australia. Gum-arabic can be obtained also from Vachellia farnesiana of India, a small tree closely allied to the true acacias; a gum akin to it is derived from Terminalia bellerica, a Myrobalan.

2. Chem.: Gum-arabic occurs in transparent white tears, which are often colored yellow or brown by impurities; it cracks on exposure to the air on the surface; it is brittle, inodorous, and has a bland, mucilaginous taste. It dissolves in water, and the solution gives a precipitate of arabin on the addition of hydrochloric acid. Gum-arabic contains about 70 per cent. of arabin, $2C_6H_{10}O_5 + H_2O$, and 17 per cent. of water; the rest consists of potash and lime, which were combined with the arabin. Gum is insoluble in alcohol. By the action of nitric acid it is converted into mucic, saccharic, and oxalic acids. Gum can be distinguished from dextrin by containing no dextrose, and by giving a milky precipitate with oxalic acid. Gum gives precipitate with soluble salts of lead, copper, &c. The specific gravity of gum is 1.35. Ferric chloride precipitates gum and not dextrin.

Gum-arabic tree:

Bot.: (1) Acacia arabica, (2) A. verec.

Red gum-arabic tree:

Bot.: Acacia adansoni.

gum-butea, s.

Bot., Chem., & Comm.: A gum exuding from Butea frondosa and B. superba, two papilionaceous plants, and hardening upon their branches in beautiful ruby-colored masses. The natives of northwestern India use it in precipitating their indigo and in tanning. (Lindley.)

gum-clistus, s.

Bot.: Cistus ladaniferus, a plant introduced into British greenhouses in A. D. 1629 from Spain. It produces ladanum, but not in the same quantity that Cistus creticus does.

gum-dragon, s.

Bot., Comm., &c.: A gum derived from Pterocarpus draco, a papilionaceous plant.

gum-elastic, s. Caoutchouc; india-rubber.

gum-elemi, s.

Bot., Chem., & Comm.: A gum said to be yielded by Amyris plumieri and A. hexandra.

¶ American gum-elemi: A gum derived in part from Icica icariba.

Bot., Chem., Comm., &c.: The resin of Callitris quadrivalvis, a native of Barbary. The same as GUM-SANDARACH (q. v.). Once it was believed to come from the juniper, whence its name.

gum-kino, s.

Bot., Chem., Comm., &c.: The name given to various resins; that of the East Indies is derived from Pterocarpus marsupium; that of Australia from Eucalyptus resinifera.

gum-lac, s.

Bot., Chem., Comm., &c.:

1. The juice of Ficus indica, benghalensis, and tejala, when it runs from wounds made by parasitic cocci.

2. The juice of Aleurites laccifera, a Ceylonese tree, belonging to the Euphorbiaceæ.

3. The juice of Erythrina monosperma, a papilionaceous tree.

gum-passages, s. pl.

Bot.: Sap receptacles extending to a greater length through the parenchyma of plants than glands do, and designed for the passage of gum. They exist in Cactaceæ, Cycadaceæ, Amygdalaceæ, &c.

gum-pot, s. A copper boiler used by varnish-makers for melting the gum and mixing the ingredients.

gum-resins, s. pl.: A name given to resins which are partly soluble in water, the remainder being soluble in alcohol.

Bot., Chem., Comm., &c.: A gum exuding from Callitris quadrivalvis, one of the Cupressæ, growing in Barbary, where it is called the Arar tree. It is a whitish yellow, brittle, inflammable, resinous substance, with an acrid, aromatic taste. It is used for making varnish, and when powdered constitutes pounce (q. v.).

gum-senegal, s.

Bot., Chem., Comm., &c.: A gum obtained in the west of Africa from the Acacia verec and A. adansoni.

gum-shoes, s. pl. Rubbers; india-rubber overshoes.

1. Comm.: The gum of Chondrilla juncea.

2. Bot.: That plant itself; it is a composite one.

gum-tragacanth, s.

Bot., Chem., Comm., &c.: A gum produced at Sierra Leone by Sterculia tragacantha. One akin to it is yielded by S. urens of Coromandel.

gum-trees, s. pl.

Botany: The several species of the myrtaceous genus, Eucalyptus (q. v.). Some of them are giant trees, others of more moderate size; their native country is Australia. Some are called Stringy-bark Gum-trees.

2. Xanthorrhæa, a genus of Liliaceæ.

¶ The Black, called also the Yellow, Gum-tree, is Nyssa villosa; the Blue, Eucalyptus globulus; and the Red or White Gum-tree is E. resinifera.

gum-water, s. A distillation from gum.

Bot. & Comm.: The wood of various gum trees (Eucalypti).

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāl, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, plt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wolf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fāl; try, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

gūm (3), s. [Etym. doubtful.]

1. An instrument for shaping saw-teeth. [SAW-GUMMER.]

2. A hive made of a section of a hollow log; a bee-gum.

3. A hollow log inserted vertically into the ground as a curb for a spring.

gūm (1), v. t. & i. [GUM (2), s.]

A. Transitive:

1. To cover or smear with gum; to stiffen with gum.

"Or bleaching their hands at midnight, gumming, and bridling their beards, or making their waist small."—Ben Jonson: Discoveries.

2. To fasten or seal with or as with gum.

"The eyelids are apt to be gummed together with a viscous humor."—Wiseman: Surgery.

†B. Intrans: To exude or form gum.

gūm (2), v. t. [GUM (3), s.] To deepen and enlarge as the teeth of worn saws.

gūm-bēl-īte (u as Ger. ü), s. [Named by von Kobell after von Gumbel.]

Min.: Essentially a hydrated silicate of alumina and iron, the composition approaching that of pinite. It is found in greenish-white, short, fibrous layers in clay-slate, at Nordhalben, in Bavaria. (T. Davies, F. G. S.)

gūm-bō, s. [GOBBO.]

gumbo-musqué, s. The name given in the West Indies to the seeds of Abelmoschus esculentus. Reduced to powder and steeped in rum, they are considered to be a powerful remedy for snake bites.

gūm-liō, a. [Etym. doubtful.] Muddy.

"O ye who leave the springs of Calvin,

For gumie dubs of your ain delvin!"

BURNS: A Dedication To Gavin Hamilton, Esq.

gūm-mā (pl. gūm-mā-tā), s. [Lat. gummi=gum, which the tumor resembles in its contents.] [GUM (2), s.]

Pathol.: A muscular node or tumor, often constituting one of the tertiary symptoms of syphilitic poisoning. It ends by softening and ulcerating.

gūmmed, pa. par. or a. [GUM, v.]

1. Lit.: Smear, daubed, or fastened with gum.

2. Fig.: Stiff, starched.

"We hate the stiff and gummed deportment of the Italian."—Gentleman Instructed, p. 546.

gūm-mēr, s. [Eng. gum (3), s.; -er.] A tool or machine for deepening and enlarging the interdental spaces of worn saws. [SAW-GUMMER, GUM-LETING-PRESS.]

gūm-mīc, a. [Eng., &c., gum; -ic.] Derived from or pertaining to gum.

gūmmic-acid, s.

Chem.: [ARABIN.]

gūm-mīf-ēr-ōūs, a. [Lat. gummi=gum; fero=to bear, to produce, and Eng. adj. suff. -ous.] Bearing or producing gum.

gūm-mī-nēss, s. [Eng. gummy; -ness.]

1. The quality or state of being gummy; viscosity.

2. An accumulation of gummy matter.

"The tendons are involved with a great gumminess and collection of matter."—Wiseman: Surgery, bk. viii.

gūm-mīng, pr. par., a. & s. [GUM, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As substantive:

1. Ord. Lang.: The act of smearing or fastening with gum.

2. Hort.: A disease in trees bearing stone-fruit, characterized by a morbid exudation of gum, and arising from exposure to excess of heat or cold, or sudden alteration of temperature. It is generally fatal to the tree.

3. Lithog.: The treatment of a lithographic stone with a solution of gum-arabic, after, or simultaneously with, the etching process, whereby the clean parts of the stone devoid of work are protected from receiving fatty matter, and thus reject the greasy ink when the roller passes over the stone. The clean surface of the stone is damped after each impression, but, unless the gumming process were previously performed, it would not permanently resist the ink.

gūm-mīte, s. [Ger. gummit, from Lat. gummi; Gr. kommi=gum, and suff. -ite (Min.) (q. v.). So called from its resemblance to gum.]

Mineralogy:

1. An amorphous mineral of greasy luster, reddish or brownish color, and yellow streak. Hardness, 2.5-3; specific gravity, 3.9-4.2. Composition: sesquioxide of uranium, 72.0; lime, 6; silica, 4.26; phosphoric acid, 2.30; water, 14.75, &c. Is found in Saxony. (Dana, &c.)

2. Halloysite (q. v.). (Breithaupt.)

gūm-mōs-l-ī-tŷ, s. [Lat. gummosus=gummy; gummi=gum.] The nature of gum, gumminess; a viscous or gummy quality or nature.

gūm-mōūs, a. [Lat. gummosus, from gummi=gum.] Of the nature or quality of gum; gummy.

"Resinous or gummy bodies dissolved in spirit of wine."—Boyle: Works, iv. 337.

gūm-mŷ, gum-mīe, a. [Eng. gum; -y.]

1. Consisting of gum; of the nature or quality of gum; viscous, adhesive.

"Of this gummi and glutinous substance they frame also their dores and entries which are wide and large."—P. Holland: Pitny, bk. xi., ch. vi.

2. Covered with or bearing gum or viscous matter; productive of gum.

"Lightning, whose thwart flame driven down, Kindles the gummy bark of fir and pine."—Milton: P. L., x. 1,076.

3. Closed or held together by gum or other viscous matter.

"[He] rubs his gummy eyes, and scrubs his pate."—Dryden: Persius, sat. iii.

gūmp, s. [Etym. doubtful; cf. Sw. & Dan. gump; Icel. gumpr=the buttocks.] A foolish fellow; a stupid, a dolt.

gūmp-tion, s. [Etym. doubtful.]

1. Shrewdness, cleverness, intelligence. (Colloquial.) (Lytton: My Novel, bk. iv., ch. xii.)

2. A term in painting for the art of preparing colors. Also applied to a nostrum much in request by painters in search of the supposed "lost medium" of the old masters, and to which they ascribe their unapproachable excellence. The formula for preparing this medium gives a mixture of drying linseed oil and mastic varnish which gelatinizes; or simple linseed oil and sugar of lead.

gūn, gonne, gunne, s. [A word of doubtful origin. Skeat refers it to Wel. gun=a bowl, a gun; Ir. & Gael. gunna.] A weapon having a barrel adapted to receive and discharge a missile, which is projected by a charge of powder, gun-cotton, or air, as the case may be. The term is applied to all sizes of weapon from the hand gun, or pistol, to the largest cannon. The several general classes are:

Pistol: A gun small enough to be held in one hand, aimed and fired. Of this type there are many varieties, such as single and double barreled and revolver. The revolver is the modern pistol, it consists of a tube, or barrel, and a revolving chamber which carries the loaded cartridges, together with the firing mechanism and handle. In firing, the loaded chamber automatically revolves, bringing the loaded cartridges alternately opposite the barrel and firing mechanism.

The next step in the scale embraces such weapons as are fired from the shoulder, the stock being so formed as to rest against the shoulder when brought into aiming and firing position. In this class are placed the various sporting or hunting weapons as well as the magazine rifles used by troops in war. The modern magazine gun has a much smaller bore than the old musket, and is also shorter in the barrel, yet its carrying power is much greater. This is owing to the improvements made in explosives in recent years, as well as to the rifling, or grooving, of the barrel.

The rifling consists of a number of spiral grooves cut inside of the gun barrel, beginning at the back end straight, but gradually running into an increasing twist or spiral. This imparts to the ball a rapid spinning, or rotary motion, which prevents its turning over and over endwise, and not only increases the accuracy with which it will follow the aim, but at the same time presents less surface for atmospheric resistance.

Of the larger class, usually called cannon, there are a great many varieties, among which may be named the "field piece," a light rifled cannon mounted upon wheels and arranged to be drawn by horses. These guns are rarely larger than 3 inches in the bore, and are intended for rapid movements. The howitzer, a short gun of comparatively large bore, also the mortar, and employed mainly in siege work. The siege gun is a heavy rifled cannon mounted upon wheels to admit of its being transported across country by horses.

The guns used in fortifications for coast defense are very large rifled "pieces," the largest yet made being 16½ inches bore and about 55 feet long, its weight being nearly 120 tons for the gun alone, the weight of its "mount," or carriage, being in addition to this. The projectile, or shell, fired from this gun weighs 1,800 lbs., and the powder used for one charge 900 lbs. The range is about fifteen miles. These extremely large guns have not proved very successful in service; their cost is enormous, and their life is limited to comparatively few rounds, or shots; consequently their manufacture has been practically stopped.

The United States Army and Navy Departments have adopted the 13-inch bore as their largest gun, both for coast defense and for mounting in the turrets of the heaviest battleship. This gun weighs 60½ tons, length 40 feet, greatest diameter 4 feet 11 inches, total length of bore 37 feet 10½ inches, twist of rifling 0 to one turn in 25 calibers, number of grooves 52, weight of charge 550 lbs. brown prismatic powder, weight of projectile 1,100 lbs., chamber pressure 15 tons, muzzle velocity 2,100 feet per second, muzzle energy 33,627 foot tons, thickness of steel which shell will penetrate at the muzzle 26.66 inches, thickness of steel which shell will perforate at 1,500 yards 23.42 inches, range at 40° elevation, 10 miles. The cost of the 13-inch gun is less than half that of the 16-inch, and it can be fired at least four times oftener. The other guns of this type are the 12-inch, 10-inch, 8-inch, and 6-inch.

The next class embraces the rapid-fire and machine-guns. The former are made in sizes from 5-inch down to 1-inch. They are much longer in proportion to bore than the heavy guns above mentioned.

All of the above guns are made in sections, of steel, and consist of a central tube, over which are shrunk bands of steel, until the desired size, shape, and strength are attained. Guns above 8-inch are mounted in saddles. The machine-gun has been developed of late years to a remarkable degree of perfection, some types having been handled in service up to 800 shots per minute, and on test to even greater speed. All of these modern guns are loaded at the breech, or rear end, the ball or shell going in first, followed by the powder. The breech is then closed by a plug, which is screwed in by proper machinery.

†1. Great gun:

(1) Lit.: A large piece of ordnance; a cannon.

(2) Fig.: A person distinguished or eminent in any branch, as in speaking, science, &c.

2. To blow great guns: To blow very strongly; to blow a gale.

gun-barrel, s. The barrel or tube of a gun. Gun-barrels are known as stub, stub-twist, wire-twist, Damascus-twist, stub-Damascus.

Gun-barrel drain: A cylindrical drain of small diameter.

gun-battery, s.

1. Fortification: The emplacement of two or more pieces of artillery, destined to act on the offensive or defensive. It may be: En echarpe; having a line of fire oblique with the object. En revers; playing upon the rear of the enemy. Cross-fire; several batteries having a converging fire upon an object. Casemate; when protected by a bomb-proof chamber, and firing from embrasures. Barbette; firing over a parapet. Ricochet (smooth bores only); when the balls, with a low charge, traverse the inner face of the enemy's work, and rebound and roll along the same. Mountain; light pieces adapted to be dismounted and, with their dislocated carriages, carried on mules. Some of these have been made in two pieces, which unscrew for ease in transport.

2. Field-artillery: The tactical unit of field-artillery, consisting of six or eight field-guns under one command, together with the officers, men, horses, wagons, and stores. [BATTERY.]

gun-carriage, s. The apparatus upon which a cannon is mounted for service. It may or may not be adapted for the transportation of the piece. Land gun-carriages comprise field, siege, casemate, and barbette carriages. The two former are adapted for the transportation as well as service of the piece, while the latter are intended to be kept in one position in a fortification.

gun-cotton, s.

Chemistry: Pyroxilin. Trinitro-cellulose. $C_6H_7(NO_2)_3O_5$, more probably a nitric ether of cellulose, $C_{12}H_{14}(ONO_2)_6O_4$, as by the action of reducing agents as hydric potassium sulphide, KHS, and iron and acetic acid, it is converted into cellulose. Boiled with ferrous sulphate and concentrated hydrochloric acid, it gives off all its nitrogen as N_2O_2 . Gun-cotton was discovered by Schönbein in 1845. It is prepared by drying cotton-wool at 100°, and then leaving it for twenty-four hours in a mixture of one volume of nitric acid, specific gravity 1.5, and three volumes of sulphuric acid specific gravity 1.85, the mixture being cooled to 10°. It is then washed with water, and, if required pure, again with a mixture of one part alcohol and three parts ether to remove the lower nitrates. [COLLIDION.] Gun-cotton finely divided explodes besoda. Compressed gun-cotton burns like tinder, tween 160°-170°. It keeps best if it is washed with but is exploded by mercuric fulminate.

gun-deck, s.

Naut.: That deck of a ship of war which carries the bulk of her armament.

gun-fire, s.

Mil.: The hour at which the morning or evening gun is fired.

gun-flint, s.* A piece of flint fixed in the lock of a musket to fire the charge, before the introduction of percussion caps.

"Those things we brought away, leaving in the room of them medals, gun-flints, a few nails, and an old empty barrel with the iron hoops on it."—Cook: Second Voyage, bk. I., ch. vii.

gun-harpoon, s. A harpoon fired from a gun, used mounted in a crutch on the gunwale of a whaleboat. It is made of steel, and has a chain or long shackle attached to it, to which the whale-line is fastened. Some gun-harpoons carry a grenade or flask of poison.

gun-lock, s. The lock of a gun; the combination of parts by which the propulsive charge is caused to ignite.

Gun-lock hammer: The cock or striker of a firearm lock.

gun-metal, s. A bronze from which cannon were formerly cast. Ordinarily nine parts copper and one tin. Other metals have been sometimes added to or substituted for tin, copper still remaining the basis of the alloy.

gun-pendulum, s.

1. [BALLISTIC-PENDULUM.]

2. [EPROUVETTE.]

gun-port, s. A port or hole in the side of a ship for a gun.

gun-searcher, s. An instrument with one or more projecting prongs to ascertain whether the bore of a gun be honeycombed.

gun-stock, s. The part of a gun to which the barrel and lock are fastened. It is usually of walnut; in Europe the Juglans regia, in America the Juglans nigra.

gun-tackle, s.

Naut.: The ropes and pulleys attached to the sides of the ports, and to the gun-carriage (for light or smooth-bore guns), by which the gun is run out. It consists of two single blocks, one movable and the other fixed, the standing end of the fall being secured to the movable block.

gün, v. i.* [GÜN, s.] To shoot with a gun; to go firing.

"There is less danger in't than gunning, Sanchio." Beaum. & Flét.: Rule a Wife, i. 2.

gū-na, s. [Sansk.=quality.]

Philol.: A term used, especially in Sanscrit grammar, to denote the changing of i and ī to e, u and ū to o, ri and ri to ar, by compounding them with the prefix ā: thus ā + i, or ī + e, ā + u, or ū + o, &c.

*gū-nar-chy, s. [GYNARCHY.]

gū-nāte, v. t. [GUNA.]

Philol.: To change by the process known as gunation; to subject to the change of guna (q. v.).

gu-nā-tion, s. [GUNA.]

Philol.: The process of gunating; the state of being gunated.

gün-bōat, s. [Eng. gun, and boat.] A small vessel of war, of light draught of water, carrying from one to four guns.

gün-dā, s. [Hind.,=four of anything; a knotted string tied round a child's neck as a charm.] Four. Used by the poorer natives of Madras, &c., especially for four cowries. They are accustomed, in making their humble purchases, to place out their cowries in fours, or at least to estimate them in fours. [Anglo-Indian.]

"Five, nine, or twenty-one kowries, or as many gundas of them."—Herklots & Jaffur Shurreef: Mussulmans of India, p. 274.

*gün-dē-lēt, s. [GONDOLET.]

gün-jah, s. [GANJAH.]

günje, ganj, s. [Bengali.] A granary, a depot chiefly of grain for sale; a commercial depot in general; a wholesale market held on a particular day. [Anglo-Indian.] (Glossary to Mill: Hist. Brit. India.)

† Günje enters as a compound into the Indian names of places, as Raneegünje or Raniganj.

gün-nage* (age as lg), s. [Eng. gun; -age.] The armament of a ship of war.

gün-nel (1), s. [GUNWALE.]

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sire, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wolf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fāll; trȳ, sȳrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

*gün-nēr, gun-nare, s. [Low Lat. gunnarius.] [GÜN, s.; GUNSTER.]

1. Ord. Lang.: A person who works or is skilled in the working of a gun; a cannoner.

"Ninon Saunders, master to the sayd Gilbert Pot, and John Owen, a gunmaker, both gunners of the Tower."—Stowe: Edward VI. (an. 1553).

II. Technically:

1. Mil.: An artillery soldier employed in the working of a gun.

2. Nav.: A warrant-officer who has charge of the ordnance-stores and ammunition on board ship, and acts as assistant to the gunnery officer.

gunner's-calipers, s. pl. An instrument made of sheet-brass with steel points, and shaped like a pair of bow-legged compasses. The graduations show the diameters of shot and shell, the calibers of guns, linear inches, degrees of the circle, &c.

gunner's-level, s. [GUNNER'S-PERPENDICULAR.]

gunner's-perpendicular, s.* An instrument for ascertaining the highest points at the breach and muzzle of a piece of ordnance, when on uneven ground, in order to determine the true line of sight. [GUNNER'S-LEVEL.]

gunner's-quadrant, s.* The gunner's quadrant is a graduated arc of 90°, or rather more, made of brass or wood, and having an arm attached, which is passed into the bore of the gun for the purpose of ascertaining the elevation. The wooden level has a leaden bullet suspended by a string, which indicates the perpendicular, the deviation from which is measured on the arc. The metallic quadrant is of more elaborate construction, and has a spirit-level attached. [GUNNER'S-PERPENDICULAR.]

gün-nēr-a, s. [Named after Ernest Gunner, bishop of Drontheim in Norway, and a botanist.]

Bot.: A genus of Araliaceæ (ivyworts). Gunnera scabra or Panke, which resembles a giant rhubarb, was found by Mr. Darwin on the sandstone cliffs of Chiloe. Its roots are used by tanners, and are astringent; its fleshy leaf-stalks are eatable. The fruit of G. macrocephala is commonly used in Java as a stimulant.

gün-nēr-ēss, s.* [Eng. gunner; -ess.] A female gunner.

"Brown-locked Demoiselle Kéroigne, with pike and helmet, sits there as gunneress."—Carlyle: French Revolution, pt. I., bk. vii., ch. v.

gün-nēr-y, s. [Eng. gunner; -y.] That branch of science which deals with the construction of guns, the mode of firing them under various circumstances, the quality of the material of which they are made, size, form, and material of the projectile, quality and quantity of the charge, elevation to be given to the gun, &c.; the science of artillery.

"From the first rude essays of clubs and stones, to the present perfection of gunnery."—Burke: Vindict. of National Society.

gün-niē, s. [Etym. doubtful.]

Mining:

1. A large, open, excavated space in a mine.

2. In Cornish, a term applied to breadth or width; single gunnies are three feet wide.

gün-nihg, s. [GÜN, v.] The act of shooting or hunting game with a gun.

gün-nȳ, gün-neȳ, s. [Bengali gani.]

Fabric: Heavy coarse goods used for wrapping bales of cotton, for cotton bags, &c. Gunny is made from fibers of the corchorus (jute); the bag made thereof is used to carry grain, &c., and for inclosing articles for exportation—rice, saltpeter, pepper, coffee. The bags made from this material are known as gunnybags or gunnysacks.

gün-pōw-dēr, s. [Eng. gun and powder.]

1. Chem.: A mechanical mixture of about 74.9 per cent. of potassium nitrate, 13.3 of carbon, and 11.8 of sulphur; but the composition varies according to the uses for which it is employed. Blasting powder generally contains more sulphur. The amount of potassium nitrate can be determined by treating the powder with hot water, and evaporating the solution; the sulphur can be extracted by bisulphide of carbon. The substances produced by the explosion cannot be represented by a chemical equation, as they vary with the pressure and the size of the grains of the powder. The principal products are carbonic anhydride, CO₂, carbonic oxide, CO, nitrogen, sulphate of potassium, carbonate of potassium, and sulphide of potassium.

2. Hist.: According to Sir George Staunton gunpowder has been known in China and India from a remote period of antiquity as an agent for blasting rocks. The statement, however, is doubtful. In Europe, Roger Bacon alluded to it in his work De Nullitate Magie, about A. D. 1267. A German monk, Schwartz, about 1336, is said to have discovered the method of its manufacture.

gunpowder-engine, s. A form of gas-engine in which the motion of the piston is caused by the evolution of gas resulting from the combustion of gunpowder.

gunpowder-hammer, s. A pile-driver operated by the explosive force of gunpowder.

Gunpowder Plot, s.

1. Hist.: A plot, formed in England about A. D. 1604, by Robert Catesby, various Roman Catholics of rank, goaded into excitement by the penal laws directed against their faith and its professors, joining as accomplices. Their aim was to blow up the Houses of Parliament by gunpowder on November 5, 1605, and destroy king, lords, and commons by one blow. An anonymous letter of mysterious warning, sent to Lord Montague, having led to the discovery of the plot, various conspirators were executed on January 30 and 31, 1605, and one on May 3 following. Among those put to death was Guy Fawkes, who had been caught in the vault below the House of Lords with matches and touchwood upon his person ready to fire the train. In 1825 this "cellar" was converted into offices. Since 1605 all places connected with the Houses of Lords and Commons where explosives could be stowed away are annually searched at the opening of Parliament. [GUY.]

gunpowder-press, s. A press for pressing mill-cake into hard cake preparatory to granulating.

gunpowder-tea, s.

Comm.: A kind of green tea, the leaves used for which, generally younger than those for other sorts, are the smallest and most closely curled, so as to constitute small balls or pellets.

gün-room, s. [Eng. gun, and room.]

Naut.: A room on one of the lower decks of a ship of war, in which the junior executive and non-combatant officers live, except the warrant officers and, in some cases, the junior engineers. The senior officers of the navy and the marines live in the wardroom.

gün-shōt, s. & a. [Eng. gun, and shot.]

A. As substantive:

1. The act of firing a gun; a discharge of a gun; a shot.

"Gunshots were wildly fired in all directions."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xi.

2. The distance to which a shot can be thrown with effect by a gun; the range of a gun or cannon.

"The parliament . . . did not intend to embark them in the perils of war, while themselves safe securely at home out of gunshot."—Clarendon: Hist. Rebel., ii., 567.

B. As adj.: Made or caused by a shot from a gun.

"Great hath been the contention among the learned about fire and venom in gunshot wounds."—Wiseman: On Surgery, bk. vi.

gunshot-wounds, s. pl.

Surg.: Wounds caused by shots from guns, also by splinters of wood, iron, &c., or any other substance which the firing of guns may have made to fly about as projectiles. The treatment of such wounds is an important branch of surgery which has made great advances in recent times.

gün-smith, s. [English gun, and smith.] One whose trade or occupation is to make or repair firearms.

"It [walnut] is of singular account . . . with the gunsmith for stocks."—Evelyn: On Forest Trees, ch. vii., § 4.

gün-smith-ēr-y, s. [Eng. gunsmith; -ery.] The art, trade, or occupation of making guns or firearms; the trade or occupation of a gunsmith.

gün-stēr, s.* [English gun; suff. -ster (q. v.).] The same as GUNNER (q. v.).

† Steele uses gunner and gunster in a ludicrously figurative sense.

"Those who recount strange accidents and circumstances which have no manner of foundation in truth, when they design to do mischief, are comprehended under the appellation of gunners; but when they endeavor only to surprise and entertain, they are distinguished by the name of gunsters."—Tatler, No. 88.

gün-stick, s.* [Eng. gun, and stick.] A stick or rod for ramming down the charge into a gun; a rammer, a ramrod.

gün-stōne, gone-stone, s. [English gun, and stone.] A shot for a cannon, round stones having been originally used for the purpose.

"Tell the pleasant prince this mock of his Hath turned his balls to gunstones."

Shakesp.: Henry V., i. 2.

Gün-tēr, s. [Edmund Gunter, professor of astronomy in Gresham College, London, England from A. D. 1619 to his death in 1626.]

Gunter-rig, s.

Naut.: A topmast so fitted that it can be run up and down the lower mast as occasion requires.

Gunter's-chain, s.

Surv.: A surveyor's chain 66 feet or 4 rods (of 5½ yards each) in length, having 100 links, each joined to the adjacent one by three links. A square chain is one-tenth of an acre, or 10,000 square links. It was invented by Edmund Gunter to aid in calculating areas. 7.92 inches=1 link; 100 links=1 chain, or 4 rods, or 22 yards; 80 chains=1 mile.

Gunter's-line, s. A line of numbers on Gunter's scale used for performing the multiplication or division of numbers. It is the logarithmic scale of proportionals, which, being graduated upon the ruler, serves to solve problems in the same manner as logarithms do arithmetically. It is usually divided into 100 parts, every tenth of which is numbered, beginning with one and ending with ten, so that if the first great division stand for the one-tenth of an integer, the next great division will stand for two-tenths, and the intermediate divisions will represent hundredths of an integer, while the large divisions beyond ten will represent units; and if the first set of large divisions represent units, the subdivisions will represent tenths, while the second set of large divisions will represent tens, and the subdivisions units, &c.

Gunter's-scale, s. A large plane scale invented by Mr. Gunter. It has various lines of numbers engraved on it, by which questions in calculation, navigation, and surveying are solved mechanically by the aid of the dividers or a slider. On one side of it are scales of equal parts, chords, sines, tangents, rhombs, &c.; on the other side are the corresponding logarithmic lines. It consists of a flat ruler of boxwood, two feet long, having various lines laid down upon it, by means of which various problems may be performed by the extension of the compasses only.

gün-wale (w silent), gün-nal, gün-nel, s. [Eng. gun, and wale (q. v.).] The upper planking covering the timber-heads round the ship; a piece of timber around the top side of a boat, and having rowlocks for the oars.

"The first rope going athwart from gunnal to gunnal."
—Dampier: Voyage (an. 1699).

gürge, s. [Lat. gurgies.] A whirlpool, an eddy.
"The plain, wherein a black bituminous gurge Boils out."
Milton: P. L., xii. 41.

gürge, v. t. [GURGE, s.] To swallow up; to overwhelm.

"In gurgling gulfs of these such surging seas,
My poorer soule who drowned doth death request."
Mirror for Magistrates, p. 227.

gür-gi-ön, s. [Fr. grugeons, from gruger=to crush.] [GRUGINGS.] The coarser part of meal, sifted from the bran.

gür-gle, v. i. [Ital. gorgoliare=to gurgle, to bubble, gorgoglio=a gurgling, gorgo=a whirlpool, a gulf; Lat. gurgies.]

1. To run or pass along with a purling sound, as water over a broken or stony bottom, or as a liquid from a bottle.

"And from the turf a fountain broke And gurgled at our feet."

Wordsworth: Fountain

*2. To make any similar sound; to coo.

"For she will plain, and gurgle, as she goes As does the widowed ringdove."

Mason: English Garden, iii.

gür-gle, s. [GURGLE, v.] A purling, bubbling noise, as of water running over a broken or stony bottom, or a liquid from a bottle or other narrow aperture.

gür-glét, s. [GURGLE, v.] A porous earthen jar for cooling water by evaporation.

gür-göyle, s. [GARGOYLE.]

gür-höf-ite, gür-hö-fi-an, s. [From Gurhof, in Lower Austria, where it occurs.]

Min.: Compact porcellaneous dolomite, a snow-white and translucent variety of that mineral.

gür-jün, s. [An East Indian word.] The native name of "Wood-oil," derived from Dipterocarpus levis, in the Eastern Peninsula. [WOOD-OIL.]

gür-kin, s. [GHERKIN.]

gür-lét, s. [Etym. doubtful.]

Masonry, &c.: A pickax with one sharp point and one cutting-edge.

gür-mý, s. [GUNNIE.]

Mining: A level or working.

gür-nard, gür-nét, gür-narde, s. [O. Fr. gurnal, gournald, gourneau, gournaut, grongnard=a grunter; cf. Mod. Fr. grondin, from gronder=to grunt, referring to the noise which gurnards make when drawn from the water.]

Ichthyology:

1. Sing.: The genus Trigla (q. v.). They have a mailed and angular head, the opercle and shoulder bones spiny, two dorsal fins, large pectoral fins, the first three rays being without membranes and separated from the rest, so as to constitute cirri. They inhabit deep water.

2. Pl.: The family Sclerogenidæ or Triglidæ (q. v.). (Yarrell, Couch, &c.)

¶ Flying Gurnard. [FLYING.]

gür-ò-lite, gyr-ò-lite (gyr as ir), s. [Gr. gyros=a circle, and lithos=a stone.]

Min.: A white translucent mineral of pearly or vitreous luster, occurring in lamellar radiated concretions. Hardness, 3 to 4. Composition: Silica, 50.7 to 51.9; alumina, 1.3 to 1.5; lime, 30.0 to 33.2; water, 14.2 to 15, &c. From Skye, from Nova Scotia, Greenland, &c.

gür-rah, s. [Hind. gorhā.]

Fabric: A kind of plain, coarse Indian muslin.

gür-rý (1), s. [Etym. doubtful.] An alpine evacuation. (Holland.)

gür-rý (2), gürh, s. [Hind. gürh, garh; Mah-ratta gad, gad.] A wall flanked with towers. (Anglo-Indian.) (Glossary to Mill: Hist. Brit. India.) Any small fort.

¶ It occurs in the names of many Indian places, but is generally written ghur, which would mean a house, and is an error. For example, Gawilghur should be Gawilghur.

gürt, s. [A corrupt. of gote (q. v.).]

Min.: A channel for water.

guse, s. [GOOSE.]

güş, gusch-en, v. i. & t. [Icel. gusa, gjósa=to gush; cf. Dut. gudsen=to gush; Sw. gåsa=to blow, to puff.]

A. Intransitive:

1. Literally:

1. To flow or rush out with violence or in a stream; to pour out violently.

"Out of whose eyes these gushed streamers of tears."
Surrey: Virgil's Æneid, ii.

2. To be poured out or uttered rapidly and copiously.

"Some humbler poet, Whose songs gushed from his heart."

Longfellow: The Day is Done.

3. To be filled with water, tears, &c.

"Line after line my gushing eyes o'erflow."

Pope: Eloisa to Abelard, 35.

II. Fig.: To act in an extravagant or effusive manner; to be effusively sentimental.

B. Trans.: To emit or pour out rapidly and copiously. (Followed by out.)

"The yawning wound
Gushed out a purple stream, and stained the ground."
Dryden: Virgil's Æneid, ix. 580.

¶ For the difference between to gush and to flow, see Flow.

güşh, s. [GUSH, v.]

1. Lit.: A rapid and copious emission or flow of a liquid from an enclosed place; a liquid emitted rapidly and copiously; a rapid and copious emission of anything resembling a liquid.

"In a moment forth he tears
His little song in gushes."
Wordsworth: The Green Linnet.

2. Fig.: Extravagant or effusive affectation of sentiment.

güşh-îng, pr. par., a. & s. [GUSH, v.]

A. As pr. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As adjective:

1. Literally:

1. Flowing or pouring out rapidly and copiously.

2. Emitting copiously.

"[She] strove to stanch the gushing wound."

Scott: Marmion, vii. 32.

II. Fig.: Extravagantly effusive or full of sentiment; characterized by an excessive affectation of sentiment; effusively and demonstratively affectionate.

C. As subst.: The act or state of pouring out rapidly and copiously.

"The gushing of the wave Far, far away."

Tennyson: Lotus-Eaters, 31.

güşh-îng-lý, adv. [Eng. gushing; -ly.]

1. Lit.: In a gushing manner; rapidly and copiously; in gushes.

"Parent of rivers, which flow gushingly."

Byron: Childe Harold, iv. 71.

2. Fig.: With an extravagant or effusive affectation of sentiment or affection.

güş-îng, a. [Sc. guse=goose.] [GOOSE.] (See compound.)

gusing-iron, s. A laundress' smoothing-iron, a flat-iron.

güs-sét, s. [Fr. gousset, dimin. of gousse=the husk or cod of a bean; Ital. guscio=a shell or husk.]

1. Ord. Lang.: A small piece of cloth inserted in a dress for the purpose of enlarging or strengthening some part.

"Seam and gusset and band."

Hood: Song of the Shirt.

II. Technically:

1. Boilers: An angular piece of iron inserted in a boiler, tank, &c., where it changes from a cylindrical to a square form, &c., as in the junction of the barrel and fire-box of a locomotive.

2. Build.: An angle-iron or bracket stiffening the angle of a structure.

3. Her.: An abatement or mark of disgrace somewhat resembling a gusset, and formed by a line drawn from the dexter or sinister chief point one-third across the shield, and then descending perpendicularly to the base. It may be on either the dexter or sinister side of the shield; on the former it is an abatement for adultery; on the latter for drunkenness. Also called a gore.

4. Old Armor: A small piece of chain or plate armor inserted at the junction of the armor under the arms, for the purpose of protecting that part when exposed by the movement of the arms.

güst (1), s. [Icel. gustr=a gust or blast; gjósta=a gust, from gjósa=to gush; Sw. dial. gust=a stream of air.]

1. Lit.: A sudden squall or violent blast of wind; a short but violent rush of wind.

"Though the weather were fowle with extreme raine and gustes of windes."—Hakluyt: Voyages, vol. ii, pt. ii., p. 105.

2. Fig.: A sudden and violent outburst of passion. (Dryden: Polydoron, s. 17.)

¶ For the difference between gust and breeze, see BREEZE.

güst (2), s. [Lat. gustus=a tasting; gusto=to taste.]

1. The sense of tasting.

2. The gratification of the appetite.

"They, fondly thinking to allay
Their appetite with gust, instead of fruit Chewed bitter ashes." Milton: P. L., x. 555.

3. Gratification of any kind; pleasure, enjoyment.

gutta-serena, s.

Pathol.: The same as AMAUROSIS (q. v.).

gūt-tā (2), s. [Malay=gum.]

Chem.: A white substance obtained by treating gutta-percha with boiling ether and allowing the filtrate to cool; the gutta is then deposited and again boiled with ether till the ethereal solution retains nothing in solution on cooling. By dry distillation it yields hydrocarbons. The part of the gutta-percha removed by the ether consists of albam and fluavil, which are oxidized gutta.

gutta-percha, s.

1. Botany: Isonandra gutta of Hooker, the tree which produces the substance described under 3 (q. v.). It is of the order Sapotaceæ. It is a large tree, sixty or seventy feet high, its trunk with a diameter of two or three feet. It grows in Borneo, Sumatra, Singapore, and other islands of South-eastern Asia. It was first brought to notice by Dr. Montgomery, of Singapore. It was then common, but the Malays, having wastefully cut down the trees to obtain the juice, instead of tapping them at intervals, have now rendered the tree extinct at Singapore.

2. Comm. & Manuf.: The raw gutta-percha comes in lumps weighing from five to six pounds. These are cut into slices, torn to shreds, and then thrown into cold water, when the impurities sink and the pure gum rises to the surface. Then the shreds are transferred to hot water, and finally, they are made into solid masses, from which the moisture is driven out by kneading. Gutta-percha is used for making soles of boots impervious to water, for door handles, ear-trumpets, &c. It is made into bottles to contain hydrofluoric acid, as it is not acted on by that acid. Above all it is employed for coating submarine telegraph wires, partly to protect them from the salt-water, partly to insulate them, gutta-percha being a decided non-conductor of electricity. (Treas. of Bot.)

3. Chem.: The inspissated juice of Isonandra gutta, the gutta-percha tree. [1.] It occurs in tough, flexible pieces of a light-brown color, which are soluble in benzene, chloroform, and bisulphide of carbon, insoluble in water, and only slightly soluble in alcohol and ether. In hot countries it is liable to be oxidized by the action of the air, and loses its flexibility.

Gutta-percha plates: Forms for the ordinary printing-press taken with gutta-percha. An intaglio impression is taken from the form. This, when cold, forms a matrix for obtaining a cameo gutta-percha impression which is used in the press.

gutta-trap, s. The inspissated juice of Artocarpus incisa, and Artocarpus generally. It is used in the manufacture of bird-lime.

"Gymnick artists, wrestlers, riders, runners."—Milton: Samson Agonistes, l. 925.

B. As subst.: Gymnastics; athletic exercises.

gŷm-nic-āl, a. [Eng. gymnic; -al.] Gymnic, gymnastic.

"Gymnical exercises at Pitana."—Potter: Antiq. of Greece, bk. ii., ch. xx.

gŷm-nite, s. [Gr. gymnos=naked, and suff. -ite (Mén). (q. v.). Named from Bare Hills, where it was found.]

Min.: The same as DEWEYLITE (q. v.). The Brit. Mus. Catal. makes Gymnite the name, and reduces Deweylite to a synonym.

gŷm-no, pref. [Gr. gymnos=naked.]

1. Anat., Zool., &c.: Naked; destitute of hairs, a shell, or other protective covering.

2. Bot.: Destitute of a pericarp or other covering.

gŷm-nō-blās-tic, a. [Pref. gŷmno-, and Greek blastos=a sprout, a shoot, a sucker; and suff. -ic.]

Zool.: Not having the nutritive and reproductive buds protected by horny receptacles. Used of the Hydrozoa. (Allman.)

gymnoblasic-hydroids, s. pl.

Zool.: A name given by Professor Allman to the Corynida, because neither their polypites nor their generative buds are inclosed in a chitinous investment.

tgŷm-nō-car-pl-āns, s. pl. [Pref. gŷmno-, Gr. karpos=fruit, and pl. suff. -ans.]

bōil, bōŷ; pōut, jōwī; cat, cell, chorus, chīn, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, aŷ; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f.
-cian, -tian = shān. -tion, -sion = shūn; -tion, -sion = zhūn. -tious, -cious, -sious = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl.

Bot.: One of two classes into which Mirbel divides all fruits. It consists of those in which the fruit is not disguised by the adherence of any other organ than the calyx. Opposed to Angiocarpous (q. v.).

gým-nô-car'-pouš, a. [GYMNOCARPIANS.]

Bot.: Having the structure of fruit described under Gymnocarpous (q. v.).

gymnocarpous-lichens, s. pl.

Bot.: Lichens in which the apothecia or hymenial layers are open from the first. (Thomé.)

gým-nô-čid'-l-um, s. [Pref. gymno-, and Greek oikidion, dimin. of oikos=a house (?).]

Bot.: A swelling at the base of some urn mosses.

gým-nô-clá'-dus, s. [Pref. gymno-, and Greek klados=a shoot, a branch.]

Bot.: A genus of leguminous plants, sub-order Cessalpinieae, tribe Eucassalpinieae. The only known species is Gymnocladus canadensis, sometimes called the Kentucky Coffee-tree, because the early settlers in that state used it as a substitute for coffee. The timber is suitable for cabinet work; the bark is very bitter, and contains saponine.

gým-nô-dě-rí'-næ, s. pl. [Mod. Latin gymnoder(us), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -inæ.]

Ornith.: Fruit crows; a sub-family of Ampelidæ (Chatterers), some of which have the neck bare of feathers. They are nearly of the size of crows, and inhabit South America, feeding on fruits and insects. [UMBRELLA-BIRD.]

gým-nô-dě-r-ūs, s. [Pref. gymno-, and Gr. derē, Attic for deirē=the neck.]

Ornith.: The typical genus of the subfamily Gymnoderinae.

gým-nô-dōn, s. [Pref. gymno-, and Gr. odous (genit. odontos)=a tooth.]

Ichthy.: The typical genus of the family Gymnodontidæ (q. v.).

gým-nô-dōnt, s. [GYMNODON.]

Ichthyology:

1. Sing.: A fish belonging to the genus Gymnodon, or, at least, to the family Gymnodontidæ.

2. Pl.: That family itself.

gým-nô-dōn'-tí-dæ, gým-nô-dōn'-tæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. gymnodon, genit. gymnodont(ous); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Ichthy.: Globe-fishes; a family of fishes, sub-order Plectognathi. Instead of teeth there is a sheath of a substance resembling ivory inclosing the jaws. This enables these fishes to break the shells of crustaceans and mollusks, which, with seaweeds, constitute their food. They have leathery skins, usually defended by spines. They chiefly inhabit the warmer seas. Genera: Diodon, Gymnodon, Tetraodon, &c. (q. v.).

gým-nôg'-ēn-ōus, a. [Eng. gymnogen; -ous.]

Bot.: Of or pertaining to the Gymnogens; gymnospermous.

gým-nô-gēng, s. pl. [Pref. gymno-, and gennao=to engender, to produce. So named from the seeds being quite naked.]

1. Bot.: The sixth of the seven classes into which Lindley divides the Vegetable Kingdom. He places it between the Dictyogens, and the Exogens. It is not, however, the Dictyogens, but the Higher Acrogens, like the Lycopodiaceae, which approach them from below. In the other direction they are closely akin to Exogens, agreeing in everything pertaining to their vegetation, in their concentric zones of wood, and in having a vascular system and spiral vessels, and a central pith. The essential point in which they differ is that there is no pericarpal covering in the female flower, which receives fertilization through the foramen of the ovule without intervention of style or stigma. There are also large perforations or discs in the wood, a structure seen only in a few Exogens. The Gymnogens are often called Gymnosperms or gymnospermous plants. The class contains four orders: Cycadaceae, Pinaceae, Taccaceae, and Gnetaeae (q. v.).

2. Palaeobotany: The Cryptogams and Gymnogens or Gymnosperms seem to have been brought into being and to have flourished long prior to the Monocotyledons and Dicotyledons; all the supposed Palms, Arads, and other Monocotyledons of the Carboniferous period having been explained away. Apparently true Gymnogens exist in the Devonian rocks. Dadoxylon, which is from them, seems a Conifer, and that order was well represented in the Carboniferous period. Cycads also occurred, and perhaps Taxaceae. (Prof. Williamson, Brit. Assoc. Rep. (1883), pp. 485, &c.) gým-nô-glōs'-sæ, s. pl. [Gr. gymnos=naked, and glossa=tongue.]

Zool.: A family of gastropods, in which the odontophore is without teeth.

gým-nô-grām'-mē, gým-nô-grām'-mæ, s. [Pref. gymno-, and Gr. grammē=a line, an outline. Named from the naked sori.]

Bot.: A genus of ferns with one to three pinnate leaves; sori dorsal, oblong, or linear, often confluent; involucre none. Known species, eighty-four. Gymnogramme leptophylla is a small fern with fragile fronds one to three inches long. It is found in this country, in continental Europe, Asia, Africa, Australia, and New Zealand. (Sir J. Hooker.)

gým-nôg'-y-noūs, a. [Pref. gymno-, Gr. gynē=a woman, and suff. -ous.]

Bot.: Having the ovary naked.

gým-nô-læ'-mæ-tæ, s. pl. [Pref. gymno-, and Gr. laimos=the throat.]

1. Zool.: An order of Polyzoa, in which the mouth is destitute of the valvular structure called the epistome, and consequently the opening into the gullet is uncovered. It is divided into four sub-orders: Paludicelleae, Cheilostomata, Cyclostomata, and Ctenostomata. 2. Palæont.: Apparently the order has existed from the Upper Cambrian times till now.

gým-nô-mí-trí-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Latin gymnomitrium, and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Bot.: A family of plants, sub-order Jungermannae.

gým-nô-mí-trí-um, s. [Pref. gymno-, and Gr. mitrion, dimin. of mitra=a belt or girdle.]

Bot.: The typical genus of the family Gymnomitridæ (q. v.).

gým-nô-nô'-tí, s. pl. [Gr. gymnos=naked, and nōtos=the back.]

Ichthy.: A family of fishes in which the dorsal fin is wanting. It includes the Gymnotus (q. v.).

gým-nô-pæd'-ic, a. [Gr. gymnos=naked, and pais (genit. paidos)=a child.]

Zool.: Used in connection with certain birds; having young which, when hatched, are naked.

gým-nô-phí-ōn'-æ, s. pl. [Pref. gymno-, and Gr. ophioneos=of or belonging to a serpent; ophis=a snake.]

Zool.: The name given by Professor Huxley to an order of Amphibia. They have rounded, worm-like bodies, devoid of limbs and tail. They have scales imbedded in the integument; the dorsal vertebrae are biconcave, and possess double transverse processes, with which the capitula and tubercula of the ribs articulate. Called by Cuvier Naked Serpents; by some authors Cæciliae; and by Professor Owen Ophiomorpha. Known genera: Cæcilia, Siphonops, Ichthyopsis, and Rhinatrema.

gým-nôph-thál'-mæ-tæ, s. pl. [Prefix gymno-; Gr. ophthalmos=an eye, and Lat. neut. pl. suff. -ata.]

Zool.: The Craspedote Medusæ of the class Hydrozoa. (Huxley.) [GYMNOPHTHALMATE MEDUSÆ.]

gým-nôph-thál'-mæte, adj. [GYMNOPHTHALMATA.]

Zool.: Naked-eyed.

gymnophthalmate medusæ, s. pl.

Zool.: The name given by Prof. Edward Forbes to living organisms, now known to be of two distinct kinds: (1) free medusiform gonophores of various Corynida, Campanularida, and the Oceanic Hydrozoa; (2) free Medusidæ in all respects resembling No. 1 in anatomical structure, but whose ova do not give rise to a free zooid, but to a free swimming organism like the parent hydrosoma—viz., Trochymenidæ, Geryoniidæ, and Æginiidæ. (Nicholson.)

gým-nôph-thál'-mí-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. gymnophthalm(us), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zool.: A family of saurians, having a very long, snake-like body, with the limbs rudimentary or wanting. They have wide mouths, their eyes without eyelids, either covered by a transparent capsule, or concealed under the skin. Found in Australia; more rarely in the east of Europe and the West Indies.

gým-nôph-thál'-mūs, s. [Pref. gymno-, and Gr. ophthalmos=an eye.]

Zool.: The typical genus of the family Gymnophthalmidæ (q. v.).

gým-nô-plást, s. [Greek gymnos=naked, and plassein=to shape, to mold.]

Biol.: A mass of protoplasm devoid of any covering, as a white blood corpuscle.

gým-nô-rhí'-næ, s. [Pref. gymno-, and Gr. rhis (genit. rhinos)=the nose.]

Ornith.: A genus of Corvidæ, sub-family Streptopernæ (Piping Crows). Gymnorhina tibicen is the Flute-player of Australia.

Gymnogramme.

gým-nô-sô'-mæ-tæ, s. pl. [Pref. gymno-, and Gr. sōmata, pl. of sōma=body.]

Zool.: One of two families into which the molluscous class Pteropoda is divided. The animal is naked, without mantle or shell, the head distinct, the gill indistinct, the fins attached to the sides of the neck. It contains the solitary family Clidiæ. (S. P. Woodward.)

gým-nôs'-ô-phist, s. [Gr. gymnosophistai, from gymnos=naked, and sophistes=a master of one's craft, a skillful man, a wise man, a sophist; sophos=wise.]

Philos. & Hist. (pl.): Another name for the sophists, the first of seven classes of Indian society described by Arrian, a writer of the second century, whose descriptions, however, were founded on the authority of Alexander the Great's companions in arms, and on that of Megasthenes. According to Arrian, the sophists went naked (whence the name Gymnosophists), in winter basking in the sun, and in summer sheltering themselves under trees so umbrageous that they could shelter 10,000 men. The allusion is evidently to the Banian tree (Ficus indica). According to Strabo, one of them, Calanus by name, brought to Europe, ascended the funeral pile "according to the law of his country." Arrian identifies the sophists with the Brahmans, as do Ambrose and others. But as the position of sophist was open to all classes of the community, and as the sophists ate with others, it is probable that they were Hindu Sunyasis or other ascetics, or Buddhists free from the restraints of caste.

gým-nôs'-ô-phý, s. [GYMNOSOPHIST.] The teaching or doctrines of the Gymnosophists.

gým-nô-spēr'-mæ, s. [Pref. gymno-, and Gr. sperma=seed. So named because the seed is destitute of pappus.]

Bot.: The typical genus of the tribe Gymnospermæ.

gým-nô-spēr'-mē-sæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. gymnosperm(a), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -eæ.]

Bot.: A sub-tribe of composite plants, tribe Asteroideæ.

gým-nô-spēr'-mí-æ, s. pl. [GYMNOSPERMA.]

Botany:

1. The name given by Linnaeus to an order of Didymia characterized, he believed, by naked seeds. He included under it most of the Labiate, which at the first glance seem to have four erect seeds quite uncovered. Careful observation shows, however, that they are inclosed in a thin pericarp, and the term gymnospermia (naked-seeded) is consequently inaccurate.

2. Gymnosperms (q. v.). These have seeds really naked.

gým-nô-spēr'-mōus, a. [Mod. Lat. gymnosperm(ia), and Eng. &c. suff. -ous.]

Bot.: Having the ovules or seeds apparently or really naked—i. e., not inclosed in an ovary. [GYMNOSPERMIA.]

"Tissues of gymnospermous plants in the state of mineral charcoal."—Quar. Jour. Geo. Soc., xv. 630.

gým-nô-spēr'mæ, gým-nô-spēr'-mæ, s. pl. [GYMNOSPERMA.]

Bot.: A class of plants having naked seeds. Called also Gymnogens (q. v.).

gým-nô-spor'-ān'-gī-um, s. [Pref. gymno-, and Eng. sporangium (q. v.).]

Bot.: A naked sporangium or spore-case. Example, the fruit of Juniperus communis. (De Candolle.)

gým-nô-spōre, s. [Pref. gymno-, and English spore (q. v.).]

Bot.: A naked spore.

gým-nô-spōr'-ōus, a. [Pref. gymno-, Eng. spore, and suff. -ous.]

Bot.: Having naked spores.

gým-nôs'-tōm-ōus, a. [Pref. gymno-, Gr. stoma (genit. stomatōs)=the mouth, and suff. -ous.]

Bot.: Having its margin free from cilia. Used of the urn of a moss when the operculum is thrown off. (Thomé.)

gým-nôte, s. [GYMNOTUS.]

*1. Ord. Lang.: A naked person.

*2. Ichthy.: A fish of the genus Gymnotus (q. v.).

gým-nô-tēt'-tæ-spēr'-mōus, a. [Pref. gymno-, and Eng. tetraspermous (q. v.).]

Bot.: Having a four-lobed ovary with four seeds, apparently, but not really, naked. Example, the Labiate. [GYMNOSPERMIA.]

gým-nô-tí-dæ, s. pl. [Latin gymnot(us), and fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Ichthy.: A family of soft-finned fishes, sub-order Physostomata, section Apoda. The maxillary bones aid in forming the margin of the upper jaw; there is no dorsal fin, and the anal fin is very long.

gým-nô-tō-ka, s. pl. [Gr. gymnos=naked, and tokos=a bringing forth.]

Zool.: A division of Hydroidea, in which the zooids are naked, or not enveloped.

fate, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trý, Sýrian. æ, æ = ē; ey = ā. qu - kw.

gym-nō-tūs, s. [Pref. gymno-, and Gr. nōtos, or nōton=the back.]

Zool.: The typical genus of the family Gymnotidae. Gymnotus electricus is the Electric Eel (q. v.).

gym-nūr'-a, s. [Pref. gymno-, and Gr. oura=the tail.]

Zool.: A genus of mammals, probably to be placed under the Centetidae (Tenrecs). Habitat, Borneo, Sumatra, and the Malay Peninsula. (Nicholson.)

gyn-æ'-cē-ūm, gyn-æ'-cī-ūm, s. [Gr. gynaikēion=the women's part of a house; gynē=a woman.]

1. Gr. Antiq.: The part or apartments of a house reserved for the females; it was usually the most remote part of the building, lying behind an interior court.

2. Roman Antiq.: A manufactory, managed by females, for the making of clothes and furniture for the emperor's family.

3. Bot.: The name given by Röper and others to what is usually called the pistil (q. v.).

gyn-æ'-cī-an, a. [Gr. gynaikēios=pertaining to women; gynē=a woman.] Of or pertaining to women; feminine, female.

gyn-æ'-cī-ūm, s. [GYNÆCEUM.]

gyn-æ-cōc'-ra-cy, *gyn-ē-cōc'-ra-cy, *gyn-al-kōc'-ra-cy, s. [Gr. gynaikokratia, from gynē (genit. gynaikos)=a woman, and kratoō=to rule.] Female rule or government; government by a woman.

"Bachofen has misinterpreted many of the facts bearing on ancient gynaikocracy,"—McLennan: Studies in Primitive History, p. 419.

gyn-æ-cōl'-ō-gy, gyn-ē-cōl'-ō-gy, s. [Gr. gynē (genit. gynaikos)=a woman, and logos=a discourse or treatise.]

Med.: A treatise on, or the doctrine of, the nature and diseases of women.

gyn-æ-cō-mās'-tē, s. [Gr. gynē (genit. gynaikos)=a woman, and mastos=a breast.]

Physiol.: The abnormal condition of a man who has breasts as large as those of a woman and functionally active.

gyn-æ-cō-rā-cy, gyn-ē-cō-rā-cy, s. [Greek gynē=a woman, and kratoō=to rule.] The same as GYNÆOCRACY (q. v.).

gyn-al-kōc'-ra-cy, s. [GYNÆOCRACY.]

gyn-al-kō-crāt'-i-cal, a. [Eng. gynaikocrata (cy), t connective, and suff. -ical.] Pertaining to female rule or government.

"The rise and consolidation of gynaikocratical power in the Greek area,"—McLennan: Studies in Primitive History, p. 416.

†gyn-ān'-dēr, s. [GYNANDRIA.]

Bot.: A plant of the class Gynandria (q. v.).

gyn-ān'-dri-a, s. pl. [Gr. gynē=a woman; anēr (genit. andros)=a man, and Lat. neut. pl. adj. suff. -ia.]

Bot.: The name given by Linnæus to the twentieth class of his artificial system, in which he considered that the stamens were on the pistil. He divides the Gynandria into eight orders: Diandria, Triandria, Tetrandria, Pentandria, Hexandria, Decandria, Dodecandria, and Polyandria.

†gyn-ān'-dri-an, a. [Mod. Latin gynandria (a); Eng. &c., suff. -an.]

Bot.: Having the structure of the Gynandria (q. v.).

gyn-ān'-drō-morph, s. [Gr. gynē=a woman, aner (genit. andros)=a man, morphē=form.] An animal afflicted with gynandromorphism.

gyn-ān'-drō-morph-ism, s. [Eng. gynandromorph; -ism.]

Zool.: The condition of certain animals in which one side has the outward characteristics of a female and the other of a male.

gyn-ān'-drō-us, a. [Mod. Lat. gynandr (ia); Eng. suff. -ous.]

Bot.: Having the stamens and pistil connate, gynandrian.

gyn-ān'-thēr-ōus, a. [Pref. gyn-; Eng. anther, and suff. -ous.]

Bot.: Having the anomalous characteristic that the stamens are converted into pistils.

gyn-ar-chy, s. [Greek gynē=a woman, and archē=rule, government.] Government by a female; gynæocracy.

"I have always some hopes of change under a gynarchy,"—Lord Chesterfield.

gyn-ēr'-i-ūm, s. [Gr. gynē=a female, and erion=wool.]

Bot.: A genus of grasses, tribe Arundinæ. Gyn-erium saccharoides, a Brazilian grass, produces sugar, though it is not the genuine sugar-cane (q. v.). A decoction of the root of G. parviflorum, another Brazilian species, is used to strengthen the hair. G. argenteum, the Pampas-grass, grows sometimes 50 feet high.

gyn-ō-, gyn-, pref. [Gr. gynē=a woman.]

1. Sociol., &c.: A woman.

2. Anat., Zool., &c.: Anything distinctively feminine.

3. Bot.: A pistil.

gyn-ō-bāse, s. [Pref. gyno-, and Gr. basis=a base.]

Bot.: A fleshy receptacle with but a single row of carpels, obliquely inclined toward the axis of the flower. It is seen in the fruit of Geranium, in that of Nelumbium, &c.

gyn-ō-bās'-ic, a. [Eng. gynobas (e); -ic.]

Bot.: Pertaining to or possessing a gynobase.

gyn-ō-car'-di-a, s. [Pref. gyno-, and Gr. kardia=the heart.]

Bot.: A genus of Panziaceæ. The seeds of Gynocardia odorata, after being freed from their integuments, are beaten up with clarified butter, and then applied by the natives of India to the skin on parts affected by cutaneous diseases.

gyn-ōc'-rā-cy, s. [Greek gynē=a woman, and kratoō=to rule, from kratos=might.] The same as GYNÆOCRACY (q. v.).

"Oligarchy, limited monarchy, and even gynocracy,"—Scott: Fortunes of Nigel, ch. xvii.

gyn-ō-phōre, s. [Pref. gyno-, and Gr. phorōs=bearing.]

1. Zool. (pl.): The generative buds or gonophores of Hydrozoa, which contain only ova.

2. Bot.: The long stalk of the ovary in such genera as Cleome and Passiflora. It is really a lengthened receptacle bearing the petals, the stamens, and the pistils, but not the calyx.

gyn-ō-plās'-tic, a. [Pref. gyno-, and English plastic (q. v.).]

Surg.: Opening the genital aperture if closed, dilating it if contracted.

gyn-ō-stē-mil-ūm, s. [Pref. gyno-, and Greek stēmōn=the warp in an upright loom at which the weaver stood; here used for a stamen.]

Bot.: The name given by Richard to the column of combined stamens in the Orchids.

gyp, s. [Etym. doubtful.] At Cambridge University the cant term for a servant, as a scout is at Oxford, and a skip at Dublin. (Eng.)

"We'll send the gyp for it in a minute,"—C. Kingsley: Alton Locke, ch. xii.

gyp-ā-ē-ti-næ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. gypaet (us), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -inæ.]

Ornith.: Bearded Vultures; a sub-family of Vulturidae (Vultures), in which the head and neck are clothed with feathers, and the under mandible provided with a bunch of setaceous bristles, diverted forward. There is only one known species. [GYPAETUS.]

gyp-ā-ē-tūs, s. [Gr. gyps=a vulture, and aetos=an eagle.]

Ornith.: The typical genus of the sub-family Gypaetinae (q. v.). Gypaetis barbatus is the Bearded Vulture, Griffon, or Lammergeyer of the Alps. [GRIFFON.]

gyp-ō-gēr-ān'-i-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. gypogera (us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Ornith.: A family of diurnal birds of prey, containing only one known genus, Gypogera. The legs are long, slender, and with an unfeathered tarso-metatarsus, so as to resemble a wader, while in other respects the structure is like that of a rap-torial bird.

gyp-ō-gēr'-a-nūs, s. [Gr. gyps (genit. gypos)=a vulture, and geranos=a crane.]

Ornith.: The typical and only known genus of the family Gypogeraidae (q. v.). Gypogera serpentarius is the Secretary Bird of South Africa. [SECRETARY-BIRD.]

gyps (1), s. [Gr. gyps=a vulture.]

Ornith.: A genus of Vulturidae, sub-family Vulturinae. Gyps fulvus is the Tawny or Griffin Vulture. It is about four feet long, and is found in Western Asia, Dalmatia, the Tyrol, the Alps, the Pyrenees, Spain, the North of Africa, &c.

gyps (2), *gypse, *gips, s. [GYPSUM.]

gyp-sē-ōus, a. [Eng. gyps (um); -eous.] Of the nature of gypsum; resembling or having the qualities of gypsum.

gypseous-marl, s.

Geol.: A mixture of gypsum and marl. (Lyell.) [GYPSEOUS-SERIES.]

gypseous-series, s.

Geol.: The Lower freshwater limestone and marl constituting the Upper beds of the Middle Eocene in the vicinity of Paris, France. [GYPSUM, 2.] They are of white and green marls with subordinate beds of gypsum. At the Hill of Montmartre is a quarry of gypsum valuable for the manufacture of plaster of Paris. Splendid fossil remains of Eocene mammals have been found in it.

The examination of these by Cuvier, and the evidence thus afforded that they were of extinct genera and species, constituted an epoch in the history of geology. Similar gypseous marls are worked for gypsum at St. Romain, on the right bank of the Allier. (Lyell.)

gyp'-sēy, gyp'-sēy, s. & a. [GIPSY.]

gyp-sif'-ēr-ōus, a. [Latin gypsum=gypsum; fero=to bear; Eng. adj. suff. -ous.] Bearing or producing gypsum.

gyp'-sine, a. [Eng. gyps (um); -ine.] The same as GYPSEOUS (q. v.).

gyp-sōg'-rā-phy, s. [Gr. gypson=gypsum, and graphō=to write, to engrave.] The art of engraving on gypsum.

gyp-sōl'-ō-gist, s. [Eng. gypsy=gipsy, and Gr. logos=a discourse.] One who has studied the history, manners, customs, and language of the gipsies.

gyp-sōl'-ō-gy, s. [GYPSOLOGIST.] The study of the history, manners, customs, and language of the gipsies.

gyp'-sō-plāst, s. [Greek gypson=gypsum, and plassō=to mold.] A cast taken in plaster of Paris or white lime.

gyps-or-nis, s. [Greek gypos=gypsum, and ornis=bird.]

Palæont.: A bird, believed to be a gigantic Rail, from the Eocene gypsum of Paris.

gyp'-sūm, s. [Lat.=plaster of Paris, gypsum, from Gr. gypos=(1) chalk, (2) gypsum.]

1. Min.: A monoclinic mineral, transparent to opaque; its colors white, gray, flesh-colored, yellow, blue, or, when impure, sometimes reddish-brown or even black. Streak white; luster various, from dull earthy to pearly or glistening on exposed faces of the crystals. Hardness 1.5-2; specific gravity, 2.3. Composition: Sulphuric acid, 44.2-46.6; lime, 29.4-33.9; water, 19.9-21.6; silica, 0.6-4.0, &c. Varieties: (1) Crystallized Gypsum, in which case it constitutes Selenite, and occurs in flatish crystals which are oblique parallelepipeds of lamellar structure, the crystals occasionally containing sand; (2) Fibrous Gypsum: (a) Satin Spar, (b) a plumose sub-variety, (3) Massive Gypsum, the same as ALABASTER (q. v.). When there is no water in its composition, it is called Anhydrous Gypsum.

2. Geol.: Technically Gypsum is regarded as a mineral deposit, in some places constituting rock masses. It may be of any age. Near Paris it is Middle Eocene. Frapoli says that some gyps were originally carbonates instead of sulphates of lime, and that they underwent metamorphism by the action of volcanic sulphurous or sulphuro-hydrous vapors. Von Buch, Murchison, and most other geologists agree with this view. Mr. Sterry Hunt believes that other gypsams may have been produced by the action of bicarbonate of lime upon a solution of sulphate of magnesia. [GYPSEOUS-SERIES.]

3. Chem. & Comm.: Calcium sulphate crystallized with two molecules of water $\text{CaSO}_4 \cdot 2\text{H}_2\text{O}$. It is often found by the decomposition of pyrites when lime is present. Gypsum calcined is called plaster of Paris, and is used for taking casts of statues. It has been found that the addition of potassium sulphate causes it to harden more quickly. Gypsum is used as a manure; it facilitates the decomposition of rocks containing alkaline silicates.

gyp'-sēy, s. & a. [GIPSY.]

¶ For the compounds, see under GIPSY.

gyr-a-cān'-thūs (yr as īr), s. [Lat. gyratus, pa. par. of gyro, to turn round in a circle; gyros=a ring, a circle, and Lat. acanthus (q. v.).]

Palæont.: A genus of fish spines, from the carboniferous formation. The fish probably belonged to the Cestrphori.

gyr'-al (yr as īr), a. [Eng. gyr (e); -al.] Moving in a circle; revolving, whirling.

gyr'-āte (yr as īr), a. [Lat. gyratus, pa. par. of gyro=to move or turn round; gyrus=a circle.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Moving or going round in a circle.

2. Bot.: Bent like the head of a crosier. Called more generally Circinate (q. v.). Used specially of the vernation of ferns.

gyr'-āte (yr as īr), v. t. [GYRATE, a.] To move round a central point; to revolve; to turn round.

gyr'-ā-tion (yr as īr), s. [Low Lat. gyratic, from Lat. gyratus, pa. par. of gyro=to turn round.] The act or state of turning or whirling round.

"The artificial gyrations, and other singular curiosities observed in the latter,"—Derham: Physico-Theology, bk. iv., ch. iii.

gyr'-ā-tōr-ŷ (yras īr), a. [Eng. gyrat (e); -ory.] Moving or turning in a circle; gyrating, revolving.

gyre (yr as ir), s. [Lat. gyrus=a circle, a circuit, from Gr. gyros=a ring (t.), round (d.).] A circle described by a moving body; a turn, a revolution.

"Quick and more quick he spins in giddy gyres."
Dryden: Ovid's Metamorphoses viii.

A. Trans.: To turn round; to whirl; to twist around.

"His stockings loose, Ungartered, and down gyred to his ankle."
Shakesp.: Hamlet, ii. 1. (Quarto.)

B. Intrans.: To turn or move in a circle; to revolve.

"The gyring planets, with their starry train."
Drayton: Noah's Flood.

gyre-fål, *gyre-fáll (yr as ir), a. [Eng. gyre; -fål (l.).] Abounding in gyres or circles.

"Toe the flame fits gyreful awarding."
Stanyhurst: Conceites, p. 138.

gyr-ên-céph-a-là (yr as ir), s. pl. [Gr. gyroō=to round, to bend, and engkephalon=the brain.] Zool.: The second of the four sub-classes, founded on brain-modifications, into which Owen divides the mammalia, because, "save in very few exceptional cases of the smaller and inferior forms of Quadrumana, the superficies is folded into more or less numerous gyri or convolutions." The Gyrencephala are subdivided into Unguiculata (Quadrumana, Carnivora); Ungulata (Artiodactyla, Perissodactyla, Proboscidea, and the extinct order Toxodontia); and Mutilata (Sirenia and Cetacea.) (Owen: Class. of the Mammalia.)

gyr-ên-céph-a-lâte (yr as ir), a. [GYREN-CEPHALOUS.] gyr-ên-céph-a-lôus (yr as ir), a. [Eng. &c., gyrencephal(a); -ous.] Belonging to or having the characteristics of Owen's Gyrencephala (q. v.).

"These limb-characters can only be rightly applied to the gyrencephalous sub-class."—Owen: Class. of the Mammalia, p. 35.

gyr-fâl-côn (l silent), s. [GERFALCON.] Ornith.: Falco gyrfalco. It is a large and powerful falcon, used to pursue cranes, wild geese, &c. It is common in the colder parts of North America. Called also the Jerfalcon or Iceland Falcon.

gyr-i (yr as ir), s. pl. [GYRUS.] gyr-in-l-dæ (gyr as gir), s. pl. [Lat. gyrin(us); fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.] Entom.: Whirligigs; a family of Coleoptera, tribe Pentamera.

gyr-i-nûs, s. [Lat. gyrinus; Gr. gyrinos=a tadpole.] Entom.: The typical genus of the family Gyrinidae. The antennæ are short and retractile within a cavity in front of the eyes, the second joint with hair-like processes; the remaining seven clavate. Gyrinus natator, the Common Whirligig, is often seen in groups performing gyrations on the surface of water. The larva has thirteen segments, including the head, and resembles a centipede.

gyr-ô (yr as ir), pref. [Latin gyrus=a circle, especially one performed by a horse, Gr. gyros=a ring, a circle; gyros=round.] Circular, spiral.

gyr-ô-car-pô-së (yr as ir), s. pl. [Mod. Lat. gyrocarp(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -eë.] Bot.: A tribe of Combrétaceæ (Myrobalsans). The corolla is wanting, the cotyledons are convolute, the anthers burst by recurved valves.

gyr-ô-car-pûs (yr as ir), s. [Pref. gyro-, and Gr. karpos=fruit.] Bot.: The typical genus of the tribe Gyrocarpæ (q. v.). When the natives of the Coromandel coast, India, can obtain it, they use it for making catamarans.

gyr-ô-dûs, s. [Prefix gyro-, and Greek odous=a tooth.] Palæont.: A genus of Pycnodont fishes, chiefly from the Oolite.

gyr-ô-nîte, s. [Pref. gyro-, and Gr. gonos=seed.] Palæobot.: The sporangium, or seed-vessel, of the flowerless plant-genus Chara. It is very rough and hard, consisting of a membranous nut, covered by an integument, both of which are spirally streaked or ribbed. The integument is composed of fine spiral valves of a quadrangular form. The number of spiral rings varies in different species of Chara, but are constant in each.

gyr-ô-lâp-ls (yr as ir), s. [Pref. gyro-, and Gr. lepis=a scale.] Palæont.: A genus of fossil fishes, order Lepidoidæi. Professor Morris enumerates three species—one from the Carboniferous Shales, and the others doubtfully from the Trias. Dr. Ramsay Traquair considers it a doubtful genus, and would cancel the name.

gyr-ô-lâp-ls (yr as ir), s. [Pref. gyro-, and Gr. lepis=a scale.] Palæont.: A genus of fossil fishes, order Lepidoidæi. Professor Morris enumerates three species—one from the Carboniferous Shales, and the others doubtfully from the Trias. Dr. Ramsay Traquair considers it a doubtful genus, and would cancel the name.

gyr-ô-lâp-ls (yr as ir), s. [Pref. gyro-, and Gr. lepis=a scale.] Palæont.: A genus of fossil fishes, order Lepidoidæi. Professor Morris enumerates three species—one from the Carboniferous Shales, and the others doubtfully from the Trias. Dr. Ramsay Traquair considers it a doubtful genus, and would cancel the name.

gyr-ô-lâp-ls (yr as ir), s. [Pref. gyro-, and Gr. lepis=a scale.] Palæont.: A genus of fossil fishes, order Lepidoidæi. Professor Morris enumerates three species—one from the Carboniferous Shales, and the others doubtfully from the Trias. Dr. Ramsay Traquair considers it a doubtful genus, and would cancel the name.

Professor Morris enumerates three species—one from the Carboniferous Shales, and the others doubtfully from the Trias. Dr. Ramsay Traquair considers it a doubtful genus, and would cancel the name.

gyr-ô-lite (yr as ir), s. [GYROLITE.]

gyr-ô-mâ, s. [Gr. gyroō=to round, to bend.]

Botany:
1. (Of ferns): The annulus, or ring, in polypodiaceous ferns. (Lindley.)
2. (Of lichens): A shield, the surface of which is coursed with sinuous concentric furrows. Called also Trica.

gyr-ô-mân-gy (yr as ir), s. [Gr. gyros=a ring, a circle, and manthein=prophecy, divination.] A kind of divination performed by walking round in a circle or ring.

gyr-ôn (yr as ir), s. [Fr.]

Her.: An ordinary, consisting of two straight lines, drawn from any given part of the field, and meeting in an acute angle in the fesse point.

gyr-ôn-ný, gi-rôn-ný, a. [Eng. gyron; -ny.]

Her.: An epithet applied to a field divided into gyrons or triangular parts of different tinctures.

gyr-ôph-ôr-a (yr as ir), s. pl. [Pref. gyro-, and Gr. phoros=bearing. So called from their convoluted fruit.]

Bot.: A genus of Lichens, order Pyxinei. The species grow on rocks and boulders in the Polar Regions, and furnish the Tripe de Roche on which Arctic voyagers have sometimes been obliged to subsist for a time. Gyrophora devasta and G. pustulata are used in dyeing.

gyro-pigeon, s. [Lat. gyr-are=to revolve, and Eng. pigeon.] A flying target used in shooting-matches. It is sprung from a trap the same as a bluerock.

gyr-ô-ptych-i-ûs (yr as ir), s. [Pref. gyro-, and Gr. ptych, (genit. ptychos)=a fold, leaf, layer, or plate.]

Palæont.: A genus of fossil fishes, family Glyptodipterini (Huxley); Cyclopteridae (Traquair). They are found in the Old Red Sandstone.

gyr-ô-scôpe (yr as ir), s. [Gr. gyros=a ring, or circle, and skopeō=to look at, or behold.]

Astron. Mach.: An instrument constructed by a Frenchman called M. Foucault, to make the rotation of the earth visible. The principle on which it proceeds is this—that, unless gravity intervene, a rotating body will not alter the direction in which its permanent axis points. In the gyroscope there is a rotating metallic disc, the middle point of whose axis is also the center of gravity of the machine. By this device the action of gravity is eliminated. The instrument, moreover, is so constructed that the axis of rotation can be made to point to some star in the sky. Then, as the heavy disc whirls round, it is found that the axis continues to point to the moving star, though, in consequence of this, apparently altering its direction relatively to bodies on the earth. If, again, the axis be pointed to the celestial pole, which is fixed, no alteration in its position relative to bodies on the earth takes place. The only feasible explanation of these appearances is that the earth is revolving on its axis.

gyr-ô-scôp-ic, a. Pertaining to the gyroscope, resembling the motion of that instrument.

gyr-ôse (yr as ir), a. [Lat. gyrus=a circle.]

Botany:
1. Marked with wavy lines.
2. The same as GYRATE (Bot.) (q. v.).

gyr-ûs (pl. gyr-i) (yr as i), s. [Gr. gyros=a ring, a circle.] [GYRO.]

1. Anat.: A convolution; as, the angular gyrus of the cerebrum, the gyri of the brain.
2. Bot.: The annulus or ring of a polypodiaceous fern. Called also gyroma (q. v.).

gyte, s. [GOAT.]

*1. A goat.
2. A child. (Used in contempt.)

gyte, a. [Etym. doubtful, probably connected with giddy (q. v.).] Crazy; ecstatic; senselessly extravagant; delirious.

gyve, gyve*, s. [Wel. gefyn=a fetter, a gyve; Gael. & Ir. geimheal, from Irish, geibhim=to get, to receive, to take.] A fetter, a shackle, a chain (generally for the legs).

"The debtor wakes to thought of gyve and jail,
The love-lorn wretch starts from tormenting dream."
Scott: Lady of the Lake, vi. 1.

¶ Obsolete except in the plural.

gyve, v. t. [GYVE, s.]

1. Lit.: To fetter, to shackle, to enchain.
2. Fig.: To ensnare.

THE eighth letter of the English alphabet is commonly classed among the consonants, though not strictly such. It is frequently called the aspirate, although other letters are also aspirated in English. Its distinctive or proper sound is that which it has at the beginning of a word, as help, hard, hope, &c.

This sound it also has when originally preceded the w, as in Old Eng. hwider, hwer. Its sound is produced far back in the throat by an unchecked emission of the breath, the root of the tongue being very slightly approximated to the back of the throat. H has disappeared from many words, especially before l, n, r: as, Old Eng. hraf=loaf; Old Eng. hnecca=neck; Old Eng. hring=ring; Old Eng. feh=fee. It has been intruded into some words, as wharf, whelk, whelm. It has become gh in many cases: as, Old Eng. theoh=thigh; Old Eng. hech=high; Old Eng. cniht=knight; in these cases serving only to lengthen the preceding vowel. In some words h has first become gh, and afterward f: as, Old Eng. geho=enough; Old Eng. droht=draught, draft. H is commonly joined to other consonants to form digraphs representing sounds for which there are no symbols in the alphabet: as, ch in child, chill; sh in ship, ship; th in this, that, thine; joined with p it forms the sound of f: with g it sometimes forms the sound of j, as in enough, tough; sometimes the digraph is silent, as in bough, plough. The combination rh is found only in words derived from the Greek, where the h represents the rough breathing of the original rh. Ch is common in words derived from the Greek, and in such cases is generally hard, as chemistry, chyle, &c. It sometimes represents the Latin c, Greek k, as in Eng. horn=Lat. cornu, Gr. keras. In Anglo-Saxon it had initially the same sound as at present, as hē=he; medially and finally it had the sound of the German and Scotch ch in loch.

H as a symbol is used:

1. As a numeral for 200, and with a dash over it (H) for 200,000.
2. In music for the tone B natural in the German system of nomenclature, the letter B being only used for B flat.
3. In chemistry for the monad element hydrogen.

ha, interf., s. & v. t. [From the sound.]

A. as interj.: An exclamation denoting surprise, wonder, joy, satisfaction, or other sudden emotion. When repeated, as ha! ha! it denotes laughter.

"Have you eyes?
Could you on this fair mountain cease to feed,
And batten on this moor?" Ha! Ha! Have you eyes?"
Shakesp.: Hamlet, iii. 4.

B. as subst.: An exclamation of surprise, wonder, joy, &c.

"These shrugs, these hum's and ha's."
Shakesp.: Winter's Tale, ii. 1.

C. as verb: To express surprise, wonder, &c.; to hesitate; as, He hummed and ha'd.

haaf, s. [Icel. haf=the sea; Ger. haaf=a gulf, a bay.] A fishing ground in Shetland, Scotland.

haaf-fishing, s. Deep-sea fishing in Shetland for cod, ling, tusk, &c.

haak, s. [HAKE.]

†Haar-kîes, s. [Ger.]

Mineralogy:
1. The name given by Werner to Capillary Pyrites, now called Millerite.
2. The capillary variety of Marcasite.

Ha-bāk-kūk, s. [Heb. Chhabhaquq=Habakuk, meaning an embrace, from chhabhaq=to embrace.]

1. Script. Hist.: The writer of the book described under 2. Nothing is known of his history.

2. Script. Canon: The eighth of the Minor Prophets. It was composed when the Chaldean invasion was imminent, probably in the early part of the reign of Jehoiakim, about 610 B. C. The prophet's poetic genius is of a high order, the third chapter of his work being one of the finest compositions in the whole Old Testament. Several passages are quoted in the New Testament, the thrice repeated doctrine that "the just shall live by faith" (Rom. i. 17; Gal. iii. 11; and Heb. x. 58), which excited so powerful an influence on Luther's mind, being derived originally from Hab. ii. 4. Hab. i. 5 is quoted in Acts xiii. 40, 41.

hā-bē-ās cor-pûs, s. [Lat.=you may have the body.]

1. Law: A writ (more fully habeas corpus ad subjiciendum) directed to the person detaining another, and commanding him to produce the body of the prisoner, with the day and cause of his caption and detention, ad faciendum, subjiciendum, et fâte, fât, fâre, amidst, whât, fâll, father; wê, wêt, hêre, camêl, hêr, thêre; pine, plt, sire, slr, marine; gô, pôl, or, wôre, wôlf, wôrk, whô, sôn; mûte, cûb, cûre, unîte, cûr, râle, fûll; trÿ, Sÿrian. æ, œ = é; ey = â. qu = kw.

recipiendum, to do, submit to, and receive whatsoever the judge or court awarding such writ shall consider in that behalf. It is applicable in all cases where a person in custody claims to be illegally detained, or wrongfully refused bail, or who desires to be removed from one court to another.

"The day of that prorogation, the twenty-sixth of May, 1679, is a great era in our history. For on that day the Habeas Corpus Act received the royal assent. From the time of the Great Charter, the substantive law respecting the personal liberty of Englishmen had been nearly the same as at present: but it had been inefficacious for want of a stringent system of procedure. What was needed was not a new right, but a prompt and searching remedy; and such a remedy the Habeas Corpus Act supplied."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. ii.

2. Eng. Hist.: Magna Charta (A. D. 1215) provided that no freeman should be taken or imprisoned but by the lawful judgment of his equals, or by the law of the land. Two old writs, one De homine replegiando and the other Capias in Withernam, designed to guard the liberty of the subject, were found ineffective, especially against the Crown. Chitty mentions also various Acts in force in A. D. 1320 in the title of which the words Habeas corpus occur. For instance, there were the Habeas corpus cum causa (that you have the body with a cause), Habeas corpus ad faciendum et recipiendum (that you have the body to do and receive), &c. More of these were designed to remove cases from court to court. There was one, however, Habeas corpus ad subjiciendum (that you may have the body to answer), destined to become much more important. Early in the reign of Charles I. the judges decided that they could not, upon such a Habeas corpus, bail or deliver a prisoner committed to prison without assigned cause, if he were placed in custody by the special command of the King or by the Judge of the Privy Council. The Petition of Right (A. D. 1628) sought to have this state of things altered, and 16 Charles I., c. 10, accorded the change of law desired, but obstructions to the carrying out of the enactment rendering it less effective than had been expected, the enactment, 31 Charles II., c. 2, called preeminently the Habeas Corpus Act, was passed. For its nature, see the extract under No. 1. Only Parliament can suspend the Habeas Corpus Act. It has frequently done so at times of public peril or anxiety. The Act was suspended in Britain during the two Stuart rebellions of 1715 and 1745, also in 1777-79, during the American war, and in 1794, while the first French revolution was at its height. It has been repeatedly suspended during actual or threatened rebellion in Ireland, as in 1798, 1803, 1817, 1848, 1861, 1867, 1868, and 1869. To suspend such a safeguard of liberty as the Habeas Corpus Act always involves very serious responsibility, though, on the other hand, it enables the Government to seize any political leaders who threaten to head a rebellion, and successfully keep them from incurring the penalties of treason.

¶ The Habeas Corpus Act has been substantially incorporated into the jurisprudence of every state in the Union, and the right to the writ has been secured by the constitutions of most of the states, and of the United States. The constitution of the United States, art. 1, sec. 9, par. 2, provides, that "the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when, in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it." A similar provision is contained in many of the state constitutions.

hā-bē-nā, s. [Lat.,=a thong, from habeo=to hold.]

Surg.: A bandage for the purpose of keeping the opposite sides of wounds together.

II. Technically:

1. Metaphysics: Facility in doing and an inclination to do a thing acquired by doing it frequently. Reid and Hartley regard the operations resulting from our acquired dexterities and habits as merely mechanical or automatic; Dugald Stewart allows to each several motion a separate act of conscious volition; and Sir W. Hamilton accords to the mind a conscious volition over the series, but denies it a consciousness and deliberate volition in regard to each separate movement.

¶ Habit differs from disposition in this, that while both are tendencies to action, disposition properly denotes a natural, habit an acquired, tendency.

2. Bot.: The general appearance and mode of growth in a plant, without attention to the details of the subject.

3. Biol.: Changed habits either in man or the lower animals produce an inherited effect. [Use.] (Darwin.)

¶ For the difference between habit and custom, see CUSTOM.

¶ Habit and repute:

Scots Law and Ord. Lang.: Common reputation; used of anything held and reputed to be true. Thus, in Scotland, one may be by habit and repute a thief, and habit and repute goes a considerable length in proving a Scotch marriage between persons who cohabit, and are by common rumor man and wife. (Bell, vi.)

hack-kle, s. [HACKLE, v.]

1. A board set with sharp steel spikes for combing or pulling out hemp or flax to dispose the fibers in parallelism, and to separate the tow and hards from the finer fibers. The teeth are of steel from one to two inches in length, and very sharp. They are arranged in quincuncial order upon a board. The lock of flax is seized by the middle, and one end is thrown over the teeth and drawn through. One end being hacked, the other end is turned to the comb and similarly treated. This separates the ribbons of fiber, removes any remaining traces of the boon or cellular matter, and divides the fiber into two portions, the short and the long, the tow and the line. The process is repeated on a fine hackle whose teeth are more numerous and thickly set. The produce is from forty to sixty per cent. of fine flax or line.

2. Any flimsy substance unspun; as, raw silk, &c.

3. A long shining feather on a cock's neck.

4. A fly for angling, dressed with a feather from a cock's neck.

"This month also a plain hackle, or palmer fly, made, with a rough black body, either of black spangle's fur, or the whirr of an ostrich feather; and the red hackle of a capon, over all, will kill, and, if the weather be right, make very good sport."—Walton: Angler, pt. ii., ch. vii.

[MORRHUA.] The back is pale brown, the lateral line black, the under parts silvery white; there is a black, and sometimes greatly extended, patch on the side behind the pectoral fins; the fins and tail are grayish, the dorsal ones darker than the others. It resembles the cod, and, like it, is a valuable food-fish.

"On each side, beyond the gills, is a large black spot; superstition assigns this mark to the impression Saint Peter left with his finger and thumb when he took the tribute out of the mouth of a fish of this species, which has been continued to the whole race of hadocks ever since that miracle."—Pennant: British Zoology; The Hadock Cod Fish.

hädé, s. [Etym. doubtful, perhaps from Ger. halde=a declivity.]

*1. Ord. Lang.: A ridge; a cliff.

"And on the lower leas, as on the higher hades,
The dainty clover grows."

Drayton: Polygibion, s. 13.

2. Mining:

(1) The dip, inclination, or slope of a vein or stratum. The angle it bears to the horizon. The underlay.

(2) The steep descent of a shaft.

hädé, v. i. [HADE, s.]

Min.: A term applied to a vein in a mine when it deviates from the vertical or perpendicular line of descent.

ha-dé-nä, s. [Gr. hadēnēs=ignorant, inexperienced (Agassiz); from Haidēs, Hades=the nether world. Named from the color of some of the species. (McNicol).]

Entom.: The typical genus of the family Hadenidæ (q. v.). Hadena oleracea is the Brightline Brown-eye; H. pisi, the Broom-moth; and H. rectilinea, the Clouted Brocade. (Stainton.)

ha-dén-l-i-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. haden (a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Entom.: A family of Moths, group Nocturna. The antennæ are somewhat long, the abdomen more or less crested, the wings in repose form a very sloping roof, the sub-terminal line often indented. Caterpillar long, generally feeding exposed.

Hä-dég, s. [Gr. haidēs, hades, from a, priv., and idein=to see.]

1. Class. Myth.: In Homer the Greek word Ades figures as the name of a god, in large measure corresponding to the Roman Pluto. After Homer it becomes a place to which the dead go. Both Greeks and Romans supposed the infernal regions to be in the center of the earth. To enter these, in the Roman opinion, the river Styx had to be crossed by the spirits of the dead, (Charon, the ferryman, for a very small sum, rowing the boat. If, by any misfortune, the body had been unburied, the soul had to wander a hundred years on the banks of the Styx before it was taken across. Pluto was the king of the spirit world, Rhadamanthus its most noted judge.

2. Jewish belief: The place of the dead; the Hebrew sheol, which occurs sixty-five times in the Hebrew Bible, and in sixty-one of them is rendered in the Septuagint Hades. In the Authorized Version of the English Bible it is translated in the Old Testament thirty-one times by "grave," thirty-one times by "hell," and three times by "pit." The ancient Hebrews conceived of Sheol as situated below, so that souls had to "go down" or descend before entering it (Num. xvi. 30, 33; Job xviii. 16; Psalm ix. 17; Prov. i. 12; Isa. xiv. 15, xxxviii. 18), as "very deep" (Job xi. 8), as "dark" (x. 21-22), as having different floors or stories (Ps. lxxxvi. 13, lxxxviii. 6), as having "gates" (Isa. xxxviii. 10) and "bars" (Job xvii. 16), as inhabited by the souls of those who have already died (Isa. xiv. 9), &c.

3. Christian doctrine: Hades is one of the two words rendered in the Authorized Version by the ambiguous term "hell" (q. v.). Expressions, most of them obviously figurative, used of Hades represent it as situated beneath (Matt. xi. 23; Luke x. 15), as having gates (Matt. xvi. 18), with keys in the hand of Christ (Rev. i. 18), and as having in a portion of it souls in torment (Luke xvi. 23).

"And in Hades he lifted up his eyes, being in torments."—Luke xvi. 23. (Revised Version.)

hād'-līg, s. [HADE, v.]

Mfn.: A dip or inclination of a vein from the perpendicular or vertical line of descent.

hā-dīs, s. [Arab.=new, newly-made.] Tradition, particularly with regard to the sayings and doings of Mohammed. These traditions are divided into two classes: (1) The sayings of the prophet, and (2) the sayings brought by the angel Gabriel from heaven. [Catafago.]

hādj, s. [HAJ.]

hād'j-eē, hād'j-i, s. [HAJEE, HAJ.]

Hād'-lěy, s. [John Hadley, F. R. S., who in 1781 described the instrument called after him, the real inventors of which, however, are said to have been Newton and Godfrey.]

Hadley's quadrant or sextant, s.

Optics: An instrument for measuring altitudes. (Used principally at sea.) [QUADRANT, SEXTANT.]

hād-rō-sāu-rūs, s. [Gr. haaros=thick, stout, large, and sauros=a lizard.]

Palæont.: A genus of Dinosaurian reptiles, found in the Cretaceous rocks of North America, and representing the Iguanodon of the Old World.

hæ-ma, hæ-māt-, hæm-a-tō-, pref. [Latin, from Gr. haima (genit. haimatos)=blood.] Consisting of or containing blood; resembling blood in color or any other respect. [HÆMA-] hæ-ma-chrōme, s. [Pref. hæma-, and Greek chrōma=color.] [HÆMACHROME.]

hæ-ma-cy-ā-nin, s. [Pref. hæma-, and Gr. kyanos=a dark-blue substance.]

Physiol. Chem.: The dark-blue substance found in the blood of the octopus.

hæ-ma-cy-tōm-ē-tēr, s. [Pref. hæma-, and Gr. kytos=a hollow vessel, and metron=a measure.]

Physiol.: An apparatus for ascertaining the quantity of corpuscles in a specified quantity of blood.

hæ-ma-drōm-ō-grāph, s. [Pref. hæma-, and Gr. dromos=course, and graphō=to write.]

Physiol.: An instrument used for ascertaining the velocity of the blood.

hæ-ma-dyn-a-mōm-ē-tēr, s. [Pref. hæma-, and Eng. dynamometer (q. v.).] An instrument for ascertaining the force of the circulation of the blood; hematometer, hematodynamometer. [SPHYGMOMETER.]

hæ-ma-gōgos, s. [Pref. hæma-, and Gr. agōgos=leading, guiding, attracting, evoking; agō=to lead, to draw out.]

Phar.: A medicine proposed by Nicolaus Myrepsus for promoting the menstrual and hemorrhoidal discharges; any medicine for those purposes.

hæ-mal, a. [Gr. haima=blood; Eng. suff. -al.]

Anat.: Of or belonging to the blood; the blood-vessels or the circulatory system.

hæmal-arch, s.

Anat.: An arch formed by the projection forward of the ribs and the sternum to protect the heart, &c.

hæmal-canal, s.

Anat.: A canal surrounding the central concavity of a vertebra. (Owen.)

hæmal-cavity, s.

Anat.: The cavity containing the heart, the great arteries, &c., with the respiratory and digestive apparatus.

hæmal-flexure, s.

Anat.: The bending toward the heart.

hæmal-septum, s.

Anat.: A septum in man partly constituting the linea alba, and elsewhere separated into two, as an investment of the visceral cavity forming the transversalis, iliac, and pelvic fasciæ. (Quain.)

hæmal-spine, s.

Anat.: A spine at one extremity of an ideal, typical vertebra, that at the other end being the neural spine. (Owen.)

hæ-mal-ō-pl-ā, s. [Gr. haimalōps, as subst.=a mass of blood; as adj., looking like clotted blood, haimalops=bloody, blood-red, and ops=the eye.]

Pathol.: An affection of the eye, in which everything appears of a red color.

hæ-mān-thūs, s. [Pref. hæma-, and Gr. anthos=a blossom, a flower.]

Bot.: A genus of Amaryllidaceæ, tribe Amaryllææ. The Hottentots are said to poison their arrows by dipping them in the viscid juice of the roots of Hæmanthus toxicarius.

hæ-ma-phæ-lin, s. [Pref. hæma-, and Greek phaios=dusky.]

Physiol.: A brownish substance which in some cases of jaundice intermixes with the blood.

fate, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rūle, fūll; trȳ. Sȳrian. æ, œ=ē; ey=ā. qu=kw.

hæ-mā-pōph-ŷg-ŷs (pl. hæ-mā-pōph-ŷ-sēs), s. [Pref. hæma- (a-), and Eng. &c., apophysis (q. v.).] Comp. Anat.: One of two side portions of a typical vertebra, which are situated between the centrum and the hæmal spine (q. v.).

hæ-ma-stāt-ic, a. & s. [HEMASTATIC.]

hæ-ma-stāt-ics, s. pl. [HEMASTATIC, B. 2.]

hæ-māt-, pref. [HÆMA-]

hæ-ma-tā-chōm-ē-tēr, s. [Pref. hæma-, and Gr. tachys=swift, and metron=a measure.]

Physiol.: An apparatus resembling the hematometer; used for measuring the velocity of the blood.

hæ-ma-tein, s. [Eng. &c., hæmatin, with e inserted simply to distinguish it from that word (?).]

Chem.: $C_{16}H_{12}O_6$. A substance obtained by exposing a solution of hæmatoxylin in ammonia to the air, and decomposing the ammonium salts thus formed by acetic acid. It is a red-brown powder, which gives a blue solution when dissolved in potash.

hæ-ma-tēm-ē-sīs, s. [Pref. hæmat- (q. v.), and Gr. emesis=vomiting.]

Pathol.: Blood effused into the stomach, and thence rejected, differing thus from hæmoptysis, hæmorrhage from the lungs (q. v.). It is more frequent in later life than hæmoptysis, but may occur in the acute perforating ulcers of the stomach in young women. It is frequently associated with cancer, and other idiopathic diseases, but is also traumatic, especially from external violence.

hæ-māt-ic, a. & s. [Greek haimatikos=full of blood.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to the blood; sanguine.

B. As substantive:

Medicine:

1. Sing.: A medicine calculated to change the condition of the blood.

2. Pl.: The branch of medical science which treats of the blood.

hæ-mat-in, s. [Prefix hæmat-, and suffix -in. (Chem.)]

Chem.: $C_{24}H_{24}FeN_4O_8$. Hæmatosin (?). The coloring matter of the blood. It contains nearly 9 per cent. of iron. Obtained by the action of dilute acids, alkalis, and hæmoglobin, which is decomposed into hæmatin, albuminoids, and fatty acids. Hæmatin is a dark powder, but can be obtained in crystals.

hæ-ma-tin-ic, a. [Eng. hæmatin; -ic.]

Med.: An agent that augments the number of red corpuscles or the hæmatin of the blood. (Dunglison.)

hæ-māt-in-ōne, s. [Greek haimatinos=bloody; Eng. suff. -one.] A red glass known to the ancients, and used for mosaics, ornamental vases, &c.; it is mentioned by Pliny and occurs frequently in the ruins of Pompeii. Its fine red color, intermediate between red-lead and vermilion, is due to red oxide of copper, and is completely destroyed by fusion. Hæmatinone is opaque, harder than common glass, has a conchoidal fracture, and a specific gravity of 3.5. It contains no tin, and no coloring matter, except cupreous oxide. (Watts: Dict. Chem., iii. 3.)

hæ-māt-in-ūr-i-ā, s. [Gr. haimatinos=bloody, and ouron=urine.]

Pathol.: Urine containing coloring matter and the albumen of blood, but without fibrin or corpuscles.

hæ-ma-tite, s. [HEMATITE.]

hæ-ma-tō-, pref. [HÆMA-]

hæ-ma-tō-cēle, s. [HEMATOCÉLE.]

hæ-ma-tō-cōc-cūs, s. [Prefix hæmato-, and Mod. Lat. coccus (q. v.).]

Bot.: A genus of Convolvaceæ, sub-order Palmelleæ, tribe Protococcidæ. Hæmatococcus salinus is one of two convolvæ which impart a crimson color to salt-water tanks adjacent to the Mediterranean, and H. noltii crimson the marshes of Sleswick. (Lindley.)

hæ-ma-tōc-ōn-ite, s. [Pref. hæmato-; Gr. konis=dust, and suff. -ite (Min.) (q. v.).]

Min.: A variety of Calcite, colored blood-red, or brownish-red, by red oxide of iron. Constitutes the Rosso Antico of Italy.

hæ-ma-tōc-rŷ-ā, s. pl. [Pref. hæmato- (q. v.), and Gr. kryos=cold.]

Zool.: The name given by Sir Richard Owen to the primary section of the Vertebrata characterized by having the blood cold. It contains three classes—Reptiles, Amphibia, and Fishes. [HEMATOTHERMA.]

hæ-ma-tōc-rŷ-al, a. & s. [Mod. Lat. hæmatocrya (a) (q. v.); Eng. &c., suff. -al.]

Zoology:

A. As adj.: Of or belonging to the Hæmatocrya, or any one of them.

B. As subst.: A cold-blooded vertebrate. (Owen.)

hæ-ma-tō-crŷs-tal-line, s. [HEMATOGLOBIN.]

hæ-ma-tō-dēs, s. [Greek haimatodēs=looking like blood, blood-red; Gr. hæmatode.]

Surg.: A kind of cancer of which the tissue is soft, fungous, and ends in hæmorrhage.

hæ-ma-tō-dŷ-na-mōm-ē-tēr, s. [Pref. hæmato-, and Eng. dynamometer (q. v.).] The same as HÆMADYNAMOMETER (q. v.).

hæ-ma-tō-glōb-ū-line, s. [HEMOGLOBIN.]

hæ-mat-ōid, a. [Pref. hæmat- (q. v.), and Gr. eidos=appearance.]

Med.: Having the appearance of blood. Thus there is a hæmatoid cancer. [HEMATODES.]

hæ-mat-ōid-in, hæ-mat-ōid-line, s. [English hæmatoid; suff. -in, -ine (Chem.) (q. v.).]

Chem.: A crystalline substance formed by the decomposition of hæmatin.

hæ-mat-ōl-ō-gŷ, hæ-mat-ō-lō-gŷ-ā, s. [Pref. hæmato-, and Gr. logos=a discourse.]

Med.: A treatise on the blood.

hæ-māt-ō-ma, s. [Pref. hæma-, and Gr. tomē=a cutting, a separation.]

Pathol.: A rare morbid affection of the lungs.

hæ-mat-ōm-ē-tēr, s. [Pref. hæmato-, and Gr. metron=a measure.] The same as HÆMADYNAMOMETER (q. v.).

hæ-mat-ō-pō-dī-næ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. hæmatopus, genit. hæmatopod (os); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -inæ.]

Ornith.: Oyster-catchers; a sub-family of Charadriidæ (Plovers).

hæ-māt-ō-pūs, s. [Pref. hæmato-, and Gr. pous=a foot.]

Ornith.: The typical genus of the sub-family Hæmatopodineæ. The bill is long, very straight, contracted in the middle, and wedge-shaped at the tip; the feet are three-toed.

hæ-māt-ō-ŷin, s. [HEMATIN.]

hæ-ma-tō-sis, s. [Gr. haimatōsis (see def.), from haimatōō=to make bloody, to stain with blood to make into blood; Gr. hæmatose.]

Physiology:

1. The conversion of chyle into blood.

2. The conversion of venous into arterial blood.

hæ-mat-ō-stā-phīs, s. [Pref. hæmato-, and Gr. staphis=a dried grape, a raisin.]

Bot.: A genus of West African Anacardiaceæ, having grape-like eatable fruits.

hæ-mat-ō-thēr-ma, s. [Pref. hæmato-, and Gr. thermos=hot.]

Zool.: The name given by Sir Richard Owen to the primary section of the Vertebrata, characterized by having the blood warm. It contains two classes, Mammalia and Birds. [HEMATOCRYA.]

hæ-mat-ō-thēr-mal, a. & s. [Mod. Lat. hæmatotherm (a); Eng. &c., suff. -al.]

Zoology:

A. As adj.: Of or belonging to the hæmatotherma (q. v.).

B. As subst.: A warm-blooded vertebrate. (Owen.)

hæ-mat-ōr-ŷ-lin, thæ-mat-ōr-ŷ-line, s. [Mod. Lat. hæmatoxylin (on); suff. -in, -ine (Chem.).]

Chem.: $C_{16}H_{14}O_6$. Also called hæmatin. A crystalline substance contained in logwood (Hæmatoxylin campechianum). It is soluble in hot water, alcohol, and ether. It crystallizes in pale yellow prisms, containing three molecules of water. It is the coloring matter of logwood. Hæmatoxylin, fused with caustic potash, yields pyrogallic acid.

hæ-mat-ōr-ŷ-lōn, s. [Pref. hæmato-, and Gr. xylon=wood.]

Bot.: A genus of leguminous plants, sub-order Cæsalpinieæ, tribe Leptolobieæ. Hæmatoxylin campechianum is a tree about 40 feet high, with pinnate leaves and racemes of yellow flowers, which grows in the Bay of Campeachy in Yucatan, whence it has been introduced into the West Indies. It furnishes logwood, used as a dye.

hæ-mat-ō-zō-ā, s. pl. [Prefix hæmato- (q. v.), and Gr. zōa, pl. of zōon=a living being, an animal.]

Pathol.: Living creatures alleged to have been found in the blood. From the time of Pliny instances have been brought forward of such animals having been found in the blood. Most of these seem to have been founded on erroneous investigations, though some cases of modern date seem to have been established. Thus Bilhartz discovered in Egypt, in 1851, an entozoön, the Distoma hæmatobium, since called Bilharzia hæmatobia; and Hexathyridium venarum, called also Polystoma sanguicola, has been found in venous blood.

hæ-mat-ūr-i-ā, s. [Prefix hæmat- (q. v.), and Gr. ouron=urine.]

Med.: Blood in the urine, generally from kidney affections, or from direct injury, or other causes.

hæ-mic, a. [Prof. hæm- (q. v.); Eng., &c., suff. -ic.]

Anat., &c.: Of or belonging to the blood.

"A clot in one of the heart's cavities, giving rise to an inorganic or functional hæmic murmur."—Tanner: Pract. of Med. (7th ed.), ii. 17.

hæ-mō-, pref. [HEMA-.]

hæ-mōd-ōr-ā-gē-æ, s. pl. [Modern Lat. hæmodorum]; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -acæ.]

Bot.: Bloodroots; an order of Endogæes, alliance Narcissales. It consists of herbaceous plants, with fibrous perennial roots and permanent sword-shaped equitant leaves; perianth generally woolly; the calyx and the corolla undistinguishable; adherent stamens three or six; ovary generally three-celled, each cell one, two, or many-seeded; fruit capsular. They occur in South America, the Cape of Good Hope, Australia, &c. Described species thirteen known species fifty. The order is divided into three tribes, Hæmodoreæ, Conostyleæ, and Velloziæ.

hæ-mō-dōr-ē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. hæmodor (um)]; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -eæ.]

Bot.: The typical tribe of Hæmodoreæ. The perianth is smooth and short.

hæ-mōd-ōr-ūm, s. [Pref. hæmo-, and Gr. dōron = a gift; so named because it produces a red flower.]

Bot.: The typical genus of the tribe Hæmodoreæ, order Hæmodoreæ (q. v.). The natives of the Swan River eat the roots of Hæmodorum paniculatum and H. spicatum.

hæ-mō-glō-bin, s. [Pref. hæmo-, Lat. glob (us), and suff. -in (Chem.) (q. v.).]

Chem.: An albuminoid substance, which forms the chief part of the red corpuscles of the blood of vertebrata. The defibrinated blood is mixed with dilute alcohol; after twenty-four hours the hæmoglobin separates out in violet-red rhombic octohedra. It is soluble in water, forming a red solution, and is reprecipitated by alcohol. The aqueous solution of hæmoglobin has two absorption bands in its spectrum, by which the presence of blood can be detected. Hæmoglobin unites with oxygen, forming a bright-red color in solution; with carbon monoxide it gives a blue-red color. The color of hæmoglobin is due to hæmatin.

hæ-mōn-ŷ, s. [Gr. haimonios = blood-red.]

Bot.: An unidentified plant described by Milton. For def. see the extract. [HEMONY.]

"The leaf was darkish, and had prickles on it, But in another country, as he said, Bore a bright golden flower, but not in this soil. . . And yet more medicinal is it than that moly That Hermes once to wise Ulysses gave. He called it hæmony, and gave it me, And bade me keep it as of sovereign use 'Gainst all enchantments.'"—Milton: Comus, 638

hæ-mō-phī-lī-ā, s. [Pref. hæmo-, and Gr. philia = love, affection; Fr. hémophilie.]

Pathol.: The hæmorrhagic diathesis, characterized by an excessive tendency to spontaneous bleedings of various parts from very slight, sometimes inappreciable, causes, with excess of red corpuscles and great diminution of fibrin.

"The best ascertained cause of hæmophilia is hereditary disposition."—Quain: Dict. of Medicine (1882), p. 568.

hæ-mōp-sīs, s. [Pref. hæm (α), and Gr. opsis = look, appearance.]

Zool.: A genus of Annelids, order Hirudinea. It contains the Horse-leech. Hæmopsis sanguisorba, [HORSE-LEECH.]

hæ-mōp-tŷ-sīs, s. [Pref. hæmo-, and Gr. ptusis = a spitting, from ptūō = to spit.]

Pathol.: "Spitting of blood" from the lungs, a grave symptom in phthisis and some other diseases. Recurrence is frequent, and the quantity being large, a fatal result generally ensues. Syncope tends to retard this and other hæmorrhages, and ice, gallic and sulphuric acids, &c., are indicated for restraining it, and particularly of late the injection of ergotine.

hæmorrhage (pron. hēm-ōr-rīg), s. [Latin hæmorrhagia; Gr. haimorrhagia (see def.). Gr. haima = blood, and rhagē = a rent; rhēgnumi = to break, to burst through.]

Path.: Bleeding from the heart, arteries, capillaries, or veins, capillary hæmorrhage being the commonest form. Generally, though not invariably, the vessels are ruptured. In a solid organ it is called an extravasation, hæmorrhagic infarction (in embolism), or apoplexy. Hæmorrhage from the nose is known as epistaxis; from the lungs, hæmoptysis; from the stomach, hæmatemesis; from the female genitals, menorrhagia; from the urine, hæmaturia; from the bowels, melæna. The general indications for treatment are to stop the bleeding and prevent its recurrence.

hæm-ōr-rhāg-īc (æ as ē), a. [English hæmorrhagic]; -ic.]

Pathol.: Of, belonging, or tending to hæmorrhage. "The hæmorrhagic diathesis."—Tanner: Pract. of Med. (7th ed.), i. 4.

hæmorrhagic phthisis, s.

Pathol.: Phthisis (consumption) in which there is a disorganization and disintegration of blood-clots after pulmonary extravasation.

hæm-ōr-rhōid (æ as ē), s. [Lat. hæmorrhoids; Gr. haimorrhōis (genit. haimorrhoidos) = veins liable to discharge blood; hæmorrhoids, piles.]

I. Ordinary Language:

*1. A venomous worm. (Holland.)

*2. (Pl.) In the same sense as II. In the Bible called Emerods (q. v.).

II. Path.: The disease popularly called piles, consisting of tumors, from the lower part of the rectum or around the anus. They frequently discharge blood.

hæm-ōr-rhōid-āl (æ as ē), a. [Eng., &c., hæmorrhoid (-al).]

*1. Anat.: Of or belonging to the veins in the lower part of the rectum, or to the lower part of the rectum itself. Thus there are hæmorrhoidal arteries, nerves, &c.

*2. Path.: Of or belonging to the disease called piles. [HÆMORRHOID.]

hæmorrhoidal-plexus, s.

Anat.: Enlarged and copiously anastomosing veins in the walls of the lower part of the rectum, immediately underneath the mucous membrane. (Quain.)

hæ-mō-spās-tic, a. [Pref. hæmo-, and Lat. spasticus; Gr. spastikos = stretching, drawing, from spao = to draw.]

Surg. & Med.: Drawing blood. (Used of any therapeutic agent for producing an efflux of blood.)

hæ-mō-stā-gī-ā, s. [Gr. haimostasis = a means of stopping blood.]

Path.: Stagnation of blood arising from plethora.

hæ-mō-stāt-ī-cæ, s. [Pref. hæmo- (q. v.), and Gr. histēmi = to make to stand.]

Phar.: A medicine designed to stop hæmorrhage; a styptic. [STYPTIC.]

hæ-mō-thōr-āx, s. [Pref. hæmo-, and Eng., &c., thorax (q. v.).]

Path.: Hæmorrhage into the pleura; the physical signs are those of pleuritic effusion, pleurisy (q. v.), with the addition of blood in the inflammatory state, generally from rupture of some blood-vessel, as in aneurism, or of carcinoma of the lung giving way into the pleura.

hæ-mōt-rō-phŷ, s. [Pref. hæmo-, and Greek trophē = nourishment; trophō = to make firm, to make fat, to nourish.]

Path.: Over-richness of the blood.

hæm-u-lōn, s. [Pref. hæma- (q. v.), and Greek oulon = the gum. Named from the red color of the gums of the fish.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Sciænidæ, one species of which is called in the Antilles Red Gullet.

haen, pa. par. [HAVE, v.]

hæet, s. [Prob. a corrupt. of iota (q. v.).] The least thing; a jot; an iota.

"Deil hæet do I expect."—Scott: Antiquary, ch. xlv.

haf-en-deale, adv. [HALFEN-DELE.]

hæf-fēts, hæf-fits, s. pl. [A. S. heafod = the head.]

1. The sides of the head; the temples.

"The grey locks that straggled from beneath it down his weatherbeaten hæffets."—Scott: Heart of Mid-Lothian, ch. xlii.

2. A blow on the side of the head; a box of the ears.

3. The fixed part of a lid or cover to which the movable part is hinged.

hæf-flē, v. i. [An imitative word.] To stammer; to speak unintelligibly; to prevaricate; to waver.

hæf-flīn, hæf-llīn, half-līn, s. & a. [For halfting, from half; suff. -ling.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A stripling; a lad.

2. A half-witted person.

II. Carp.: A trying-plane.

B. As adj.: Stripling; half-grown; not fully grown.

"My mother sent me, that was a hæftin callant, to show the stranger the gate."—Scott: Guy Mannering, ch. xi.

haf-līng, half-līngs, adv. [HALFLING.]

hæf-nēf-jor-dite, s. [Named from Hafnefjord, in Iceland, where it is found.]

Min.: A variety of oligoclase.

haft, hēft, s. [A. S. hæft = a handle; cogn. with Dut. heft, hecht; Icel. hefti; Ger. heft, from the same root as A. S. habban; Icel. hafa; Goth. haban; Lat. capio = to take hold of.]

1. A handle; that part of an instrument which is taken in the hand, and by which it is used or held; used especially of a knife or tool.

"But yet ne fond I nought the haft, Whiche might unto the blade accorde,"—Gower: C. A., bk. iv.

2. A dwelling; custody.

"She came to fetch her out of ill haft and waur guiding."—Scott: Heart of Mid-Lothian, ch. xviii.

haft (1), v. t. [HAFT, s.]

1. To set or fix in a haft or handle.

*2. To drive or force up to the haft or hilt.

"This mye blade in thye body should bee with speediness hafted."—Stanhurst: Concetti, p. 148.

*3. To settle; to fix; to establish as in a residence.

"Ye preached us . . . out o' this new city o' refuge afore our hinder end was weel hafted in it."—Scott: Old Mortality, ch. viii.

haft (2), v. i. [Etym. doubtful; cf. Ger. haften = to cling or stick to.] To hesitate; to delay; to cavil; to wrangle.

*5. A kind of luminous or phosphoric light or fire appearing on horses' manes, hair, &c.

II. Ichthy.: The name given by fishermen to a fish, Myxine glutinosa or Gastrobranchicus cæcus, so low in organization that Linnæus considered it a worm in place of a vertebrate animal. The mouth has cirri or tentacles; there is but one tooth, and the eyes are wanting. The Hag is a parasite within the bodies of other fishes. It is believed to bore, hence it is sometimes named the Borer. It is called more fully the Glutinous Hag, from the quantity of mucus which it secretes, and which, could it be obtained in quantities, would be of economic value.

hag-born, hag-borne, a. Born of a witch or hag. (Shaksp.: Tempest, i. 2.)

hag-fish, s. [HAG (1).]

hag-ridden, a. Suffering from or afflicted with the nightmare. (Lit. & fig.) häg (2), v. t. [HAG (2), s.] To cut, fell, or hew down.

ha-ga-da, s. [Heb. hagadah=said, reported; Aramaic agadah, from nagad=in Hiphil, to point out, to announce, to proclaim, to say.]

Hebrew Lit.: A branch of the Midrash, or most ancient Jewish exposition of the Old Testament. It extends over the whole of these sacred books and is homiletic and poetical. [Ginsburg.]

ha-gäd-ic, a. [Heb., äc., hagad(a) (q. v.), and suff. -ic.]

Hebrew Lit.: Of or belonging to the hagada.

hagadic-exegesis, s. Homiletic exegesis, or interpretation of the Old Testament, a part of the Midrash. It must be distinguished from the Halachic or Legal exposition. [HALACHIC.]

"Hence the term Midrashic, or Hagadic-exegesis, so commonly used in Jewish writings, by which is meant an interpretation in the spirit of those national and traditional views."—Ginsburg in Kitz's Ency. (3d ed.), iii. 167.

häg-bër-rý, s. [Eng. hag (2) (?), and berry.]

Bot.: (1) Cerasus padus; (2) Celtis crassifolia.

häge-män-nite, s. [From Dr. Hagemann, who first described it in 1866.]

Min.: A variety of Thomsenolite, constituting altered cryolite from Greenland. Hagemann describes it as Dimetric Pachnolite, it being found with that mineral. Dana called it Thomsenolite, of which in the Brit. Mus. Cat. it is recognized as a variety.

Häg-gä-i, s. [Heb. Chaggai, or Haggai. The name means festive, and is from chag, or hag=a festival; Sept. Aggais.]

Scriptural Canon: The tenth of the twelve minor prophets. Of the seer himself nothing is known. His book has always been regarded as canonical. The several dates are all in the second year of Darius the king—i. e., of Darius Hystaspes, B. C. 520. The prophet aims at inducing the people without delay to resume the rebuilding of the temple which had been commenced in 535, the second year of Cyrus, but had been discontinued, owing to Samaritan and other opposition. Hagai predicted that the glory of the latter temple should be greater than that of its splendid predecessor, a prophecy which most expositors believe to refer to the first advent of Christ (ii. 7, 9). Verse 6 is quoted in Heb. xii. 26.

häg-gard (1), hag-ard, a. & s. [Fr. hagard=living in a hedge, wild, untamed, from M. H. Ger. hag, O. H. Ger. hac=a hedge.]

A. As adj.: Wild; untamed; fierce; intractable. "As hagard hawk, presuming to contend With hardy fowle." Spenser: F. Q., I. xi. 19.

B. As substantive:

1. A wild or untrained hawk.

"The falcon, the falcon gentil, and the haggard, are made distinct species."—Pennant: British Zoology; Lan-ser.

2. Anything fierce, wild, or intractable.

"I have loved this proud, disdainful haggard." Shakespeare: Taming of the Shrew, iv. 1.

3. A hag.

häg-gard (2), a. [A corrupt. of hagged (q. v.).] Having the appearance of one wasted away by pain or suffering; wan, pale, gaunt.

"The huge and haggard shape."

Longfellow: Discoverer of the North Cape.

häg-gard (3), hag-garth, s. [Eng. hag, and Mid. Eng. garth=a yard or inclosure.] A stack-yard.

"All to your haggard brought so cheap in."

Swift: Dr. Delany's Villa.

häg-gard-lý, adv. [Eng. haggard (2), a.; -ly.] In a haggard, wan, or gaunt fashion.

"How haggardly see'er she looks at home." Dryden: Juvenal, sat. vi.

häg-gëd, a. [Eng. hag (1), s.; -ed.] Like a hag or witch; hag-like, haggard, ugly.

"The ghostly prudes with hagged face."

Gray: A Long Story.

häg-gis, häg-gëss, s. [Fr. hachis=a hash; cf. hag, v.=to chop, or cut.]

1. A sheep's head and pluck minced.

2. A Scotch dish, made of liver, lights, heart, &c., minced with onions, boiled in a sheep's stomach. It is round in shape, hence the point of the quotation.

"Even a haggis (God bless her!) could charge down hill."—Scott: Waverley, ch. xlv.

häg-gish, a. [Eng. hag (1), s.; -ish.] Pertaining to or resembling a hag; hag-like, ugly, deformed, wrinkled.

"But on us both did haggish age steal on."

Shakespeare: All's Well that Ends Well, i. 2.

häg-gish-lý, adv. [Eng. haggish; -ly.] In a haggish or haglike manner.

häg-gle (1), v. t. [A weakened form of hackle, a frequent. from hack (q. v.).] To cut, chop, notch, or hack; to cut unskillfully; to mangle.

"Sufolk first died, and York all haggled o'er, Comes to him." Shakespeare: Henry V., iv. 6.

häg-gle (2), v. i. [Prob. for hackle, a frequent. of hack; cf. Dut. hakkelen=to mangle, to stammer.] To be long or tedious in coming to a bargain; to higggle; to cavil or stick at a price on small matters.

"Haggling with the greedy, making up quarrels."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xx.

häg-glër (1), s. [Eng. haggl(e) (1); -er.] One who hacks or cuts anything unskillfully; a mangler.

häg-glër (2), s. [Eng. haggl(e) (2); -er.]

1. One who haggles or is long in agreeing to a price; a higgler.

2. A traveling merchant; a retail dealer; a peddler.

"Horses, on which hagglers used to ride and carry their commodities."—Fuller: Worthies; Dorsetshire.

3. In London vegetable markets a middleman, acting between the producer and the retail dealer.

häg-i-ar-chý, s. [Gr. hagios=holy, and archè=government, rule.] The government or rule of holy orders of men; a sacred government.

häg-i-öc-ra-cý, s. [Greek hagios=holy, and kratos=to rule or govern.] A sacred government; a hierarchy; the rule or government of the priesthood.

"The intention of the ancient law was over-stepped in the late days of the hagiocracy."—Ewald: Antiq. Israel (ed. Solly), p. 81.

häg-i-ö-graph, s. [Greek hagios=holy, and graphè=a writing.] A holy or sacred writing.

häg-i-ög-räp-hä, s. pl. [Pl. of Gr. hagiographos=written by inspiration; Gr. hagios=holy, and graphò=to write.]

Script. Canon: A Greek word, signifying sacred writings, first introduced by Epiphanius as the rendering of the Hebrew word Kethubhim=writings. The third and last great division of the Old Testament books, the others being Torah (the Law) and Nebim (the Prophets). The division does not occur in the Old Testament itself. It is probable that the writings were originally called as they are in the prologue to Ecclesiastes, the "other writings." The three-fold division is alluded to in the New Testament, the several parts being described as "the law of Moses," "the Prophets," and "the Psalms" (Luke xxiii. 44). In this passage the Psalms are the Hagiographa. When the division is two-fold, the Law and the Prophets, the Hagiographa are merged in the second category (Matt. v. 17, xi. 13). In our present Hebrew Bibles the Hagiographa consist of thirteen books thus arranged: Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Song of Solomon, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, and 1 and 2 Chronicles.

häg-i-ög-rä-phäl, a. [English hagiograph(y); -al.] Of or pertaining to hagiography or the hagiographa.

häg-i-ög-rä-phër, s. [Eng. hagiograph(a); -er.] A holy writer; a writer of holy or sacred books of the lives of the saints; one of the writers of the hagiographa.

häg-i-ög-rä-phý, s. [Gr. hagios=devoted to the gods, sacred; (of persons)=holy, pious, pure, and graphè=a writing.] A writing or history treating of holy people; hagiology (q. v.).

häg-i-öl-a-trý, s. [Gr. hagios=devoted to the gods, holy, pious, and latreia=worship; latreuō=to serve the gods with prayers and sacrifices.]

1. Ch. Hist. & Roman Theol.: [INVOCATION OF SAINTS.]

2. Compar. Religion: The highest form of manes-worship (q. v.), itself one of the great branches of the religion of mankind. Hagiolatry, in some form or other, exists in nearly every religion, and shows how deeply seated and widespread is the belief in the continuity of the human race. In the hagiolatry of the Roman Church, the student of the science of religion sees the agency which prompted the ancient Romans to deify Romulus, and which still leads the Chinese to sacrifice to the spirit of Confucius. The worship of saints answers strictly to the old manes-worship, and they gradually replaced the old local gods and the patron gods of particular crafts. Thus St. Cecilia is the patron of musicians, St. Luke of painters, St. Peter of fishermen, St. Sebastian of archers, St. Crispin of cobblers. In fact every trade or profession has its patron saint, while devotion to certain other saints is declared to be a preservative against certain bodily ills; thus St. Vitus protects his clients from the disease which bears his name; St. Hubert cures the bite of mad dogs, and so on. [HERO-WORSHIP.]

"As to the actual state of hagiolatry in modern Europe, it is obvious that it is declining among the educated classes."—Tylor: Primitive Culture, ii. 111.

häg-i-öl-ö-glät, s. [Eng. hagiolog(y); -ist.] A writer of hagiology; one who writes or treats of the lives of the saints of any faith.

"Quite consistent with the habits of the Buddhist theologians and hagiologists."—Tylor: Primitive Culture (1871), ii. 199.

häg-i-öl-ö-gý, s. [Gr. hagios=holy, and logos=a discourse.] [HAGIOGRAPHY.] Any work on the lives of saints; used specially of the Roman Catholic biographies, legendary or historical, of Christian saints. Nearly the same as HAGIOGRAPHY (q. v.).

häg-i-ö-scope, s. [Greek hagios=holy, and skopeō=to see.]

Arch.: An opening through the wall of a Roman Catholic Church, in an oblique direction, for the purpose of enabling persons in the transept or aisles to see the elevation of the host at the high altar; a squint (q. v.).

"They do not usually have hagioscopes from which the performance of mass could be seen."—Notes and Queries, Oct. 14, 1882, p. 301.

häg-ship, s. [Eng. hag; -ship.] The state or condition of a hag; a title applied to a hag.

"Oh, 'tis the charm her hagship gave me."

Middleton: Witch, ii. 2.

hah, interj. [Onomatopoeic.] An exclamation or expression denoting surprise, sudden effort, &c.

"She stamps, and then cries hah! at every thrust."

Dryden: Juvenal, sat. vi.

ha'-ha, s. [A redupl. of haw=a hedge.] A sunk fence or ditch; a haw-haw.

hài-ding-ër-ite, s. [Named after W. Haidinger.]

Mineralogy:

1. That of Turner: An orthorhombic, white, transparent or translucent, sectile mineral of vitreous luster. Hardness, 1.5-2.5; specific gravity, 2.85. Composition: Arsenic acid, 58.1; lime, 28.3; water, 13.6=100. From Baden or Joachimsthal. (Dana.)

2. That of Berthier: The same as BERTHIERITE (q. v.).

hal'-dúck, hey'-dúck, hey'-dúc, s. [Hung. hajduk=drovers.] A name given to the halberdiers of Hungarian nobles and attendants in German courts; formerly a mercenary foot-soldier in Hungary.

"I learned the art from a Polonian heyduck."—Scott: Legend of Montrose, ch. xiii.

hàik, s. [Arab. hàik, from hako=to weave.] A piece of woolen or cotton cloth worn by Arabs over the tunic, and under the burnoose; a hyke.

hàil, haile, hayl, hayle, s. [A. S. hagal, hagol; cogn. with Icel. hagl; Ger., Dutch, Dan. & Sw. hagel.]

Physics & Meteorol.: Ice, generally of globular form, or consisting of various globules cemented together, showers of which fall from the sky. Its descent is heralded and accompanied by a peculiar noise. It does not often fall at night. If it falls in winter, it is at the beginning and end of it rather than during its depth. It is often the precursor of storms. As a rule it acts within a line of considerable length, but of very limited breadth. The exact method of the formation in the sky is not quite understood.

hail-mixed, a. Mingled with hail.

"The drifted turbulence Of hail-mixed snows."—Mallet.

hàil (1), haile, hail-en, hayl, v. i. & t. [HAIL; s.]

A. Intrans.: To pour down hail.

"My people shall dwell in a peaceable habitation, when it shall hail."—Isaiah xxxii. 19.

Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream, i. 1.

hàil (2), heile, heil-en, hey-l-yn, v. t. & i. [Formed from Icel. heill=hale, sound.]

A. Transitive:

1. To call to, as to a person at a distance to arrest his attention; specif., of a ship for purposes of communication.

"But ere he came, like one that hails a ship, Cried out with a big voice, 'What, is he dead?'"

Tennyson: Geraint and Enid, 1389.

2. To designate; to call; to address as.

"I gained a son,

And such a son as all men *hail*ed me happy."

Milton: Samson Agonistes, 354.

3. To welcome, to salute.

"The ravished crowds shall hail their passing lord."

Pitt: Vida: Art of Poetry, bk. i.

B. Intransitive:

Naut.: Applied to a vessel with respect to the port from which she sails; as, A ship hails from San Francisco; hence, generally, to come; as, He hails from Boston.

fâte, fât, fâre, amidst, whât, fâll, father; wê, wêt, hère, camêl, hêr, thêre; pine, pît, sîre, sîr, marîbe; gô, pôl, or, wôre, wôlf, wôrk, whô, sôn; mûte, cûb, cûre, unite, cûr, râle, fûll; trý, sýrian. æ, œ = é; ey = â. qu = kw.

A. As adj.: Hearty, whole, and sound.

B. As interj.: An exclamation of greeting, welcome, or salutation.

"Hail, sable power,
To me more dear than riches and renown!"
Smollett: Regicide, iii. 1.

C. As subst.: A salutation, a greeting, a welcome.

Hail Mary, s.

Eccles. & Ch. Hist.: The best known and most general form of prayer which the Roman Church makes use of in honor of the Blessed Virgin. It consists of three parts: the salutation of the angel, "Hail, Mary! full of grace, the Lord is with thee" (Luke i. 28); and the words of Elizabeth, "Blessed art thou amongst women, blessed is the fruit of thy womb" (Luke i. 42), to which has been added the word Jesus; and the conclusion, "Holy Mary, Mother of God, pray for us sinners, now and at the hour of our death. Amen." Some theologians have held that the latter part was added by the Council of Ephesus [A. D. 431], that the petition as far as "sinners" dates from 1508, and that the remainder is of still later date, and of Franciscan origin. (Goschler.) The Hail Mary now finds a place in many Ritualistic books of devotion.

hail (2), s. [HAILE (2), v.] A call; an address of welcome or salutation.

¶ Within hail: Within the reach of the voice; within call.

hail-fellow, s. An intimate acquaintance; one in intimate companionship.

hail'-stone, s. [Eng. hail, and stone.] One of the stony-like bodies consisting of frozen water, which, descending from the sky, constitute hail.

"You are no surer, no,
Than is the coal of fire upon the ice,
Or hailstone in the sun."

Shakesp.: Coriolanus, i. 1.

hail'-storm, s. [Eng. hail, and storm.] A storm or heavy fall of hail.

hail'-y, a. [Eng. hail (1), s.; -y.] Consisting of or resembling hail.

"A rattling tempest pours,
Which the cold North congeals to hailly showers."
Pope: Statius: Thebais i. 495.

hain, v. t. & i. [Icel. hagna=to hedge, to inclose, to protect.]

A. Transitive:

1. To set aside or inclose for mowing.
2. To spare, to save.

"Wi' tentie care I'll fl't thy tether,
To some hain'd rig."

Burns: Auld Farmer's Salutation.

B. Intrans.: To be sparing, saving, or parsimonious.

hain'-oüs, a. [HEINOUS.]

hair, *haire, *heer, *her, *here, s. [A. S. hær, hær; cogn. with Dut. haar; Icel. hár; Dan. haar; Sw. hår.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

- (1) In the same sense as II. 1.

"The Indians of Tancuyabo wear their haire long downe to their knees."—Hackluyt: Voyages, iii. 450.

*(2) A kind of cloth or garment made of hair-cloth.

"And therto she had on an haire."

Romance of the Rose.

- (3) A single filament of hair.

"And beauty draws us with a single hair."

Pope: Rape of the Lock, ii. 28.

2. Figuratively:

(1) Anything proverbially small or fine; a very small distance or degree. [HAIR-BREADTH.]

"If I swere a hair from truth."

Shakesp.: Troilus and Cressida, iii. 2.

*(2) Course, direction, order, tendency, grain (from the hair naturally falling in a certain direction).

"If you should fight, you go against the hair of your profession."—Shakesp.: Merry Wives of Windsor, ii. 3.

II. Technically:

1. Anat. & Phys.: The structure is analogous to that of the teeth, the hair-follicle being an invagination of the skin, as the tooth-follicle is of the mucous membrane, and is formed like dentine by the conversion of pulp enclosed in a follicle, the external and densest part being the bulb, the soft interior the pulp. Hairs, like the nails, are horny protuberances from the epidermis, and show two parts, the cortical or investing (horny), and the medullary (the pithy interior), varying in different animals, from the hedge-hog and porcupine to the musk-deer. Human hair is composed of a tube of horny fibrous substance, with a central medulla inclosing pigment cells; outside all are scales like tiles on a roof, forming delicate lines on the hair-surfaces, transverse, oblique, or spiral. Emotion has been known to turn the hair white in a single night, but of all the animal tissues it is the most durable, being found very perfect in Egyptian mummies nearly 4,000 years old.

¶ Darwin points out an apparent correlation between hair and teeth.

2. Bot.: Minute transparent filiform acute processes composed of cellular tissue more or less elongated, and arranged in a single row. They are formed by the epidermis, and may consist of a single cell, a cell-row, a cell-surface, or a cell-mass. They may, on the one hand, be simple or lymphatic; or, on the other, may be glandular. They are of various types: thus there may be stellate, scabrous, uncinated hairs, &c.

3. Comm.: Curled hair for stuffing sofas, cushions, &c., is carded by hand-cards, which straighten, disentangle, and clean it; this is taken in bunches and spun into a rope, the next top, as the bunch is called, being interlaced with the loose strands of the former. The rope is wound on a wheel, and the coil steeped in water for three or four hours, and dried in a hot oven. The ropes are then untwisted, the hairs torn apart, and are ready to form stuffing. Curled hair cords are also used for clothes-lines, and when fine for fishing-lines. Long and fine horse-hairs are used for the bows of violins and other instruments of this class; also for making hair-cloth (q. v.).

4. Firearms: A spring or other contrivance in one form of rifle or pistol-lock, which is freed by the hair-trigger, and, striking with the tumbler-catch, releases the tumbler.

¶ (1) Not worth a hair: Of no value.

(2) To a hair: To an extreme nicety.

(3) To split hairs: To cavil or quibble about trifles; to be over-nice.

(4) Both of a hair: Both alike.

hair-bracket, s.

Shipbuild.: A molding which is inserted at the back of or runs aft from the figure-head.

hair-brained, a. [HARE-BRAINED.]

hair-branch, a.

Bot.: Having villous branches.

Hair-branch tree:

Bot.: Trichocladus crinitus, a Cape genus of the Hamamelidaceæ.

hair-breadth, *haire-breadth, s. & a.

A. As substantive:

1. Ord. Lang.: The breadth or diameter of a hair; a very small or minute distance, among the Jews reckoned at $\frac{1}{16}$ of an inch.

2. Bot.: The twelfth part of a line. (Lindley.) A third of the Jewish estimate. [1.]

"Seven hundred chosen men left-handed could sling stones at an hair-breadth, and not miss."—Judges, xx. 16.

B. As adj.: Of the breadth of a hair; exceedingly narrow or close.

"His hair-breadth 'scapes and all his daring schemes."

Cowper: Tirocinium, 230.

hair-broom, s. A broom or brush made of hair.

hair'-cloth, s. [Eng. hair, and cloth.] Stuff or cloth made wholly or in part of hair, and used for the covering of chairs, couches, cushions, &c. In the form of a shirt it was formerly much used in penance. Horsehair for the manufacture of hair-cloth is principally derived from South America. It is first sorted according to color, and then hackled. A number of tufts are then placed between the teeth of two cards, and the longer hairs removed by hand, so as to leave only those of uniform length. Hair is curled by forming it into a rope, which is afterward boiled, and then baked so as to set the kink in the hairs. Haircloth is made from the longer and better varieties. The hair is first dyed, usually of a black color, and is merely employed as the weft of the cloth, the warp being composed of cotton or linen thread, according to quality and purpose.

haircloth-loom, s. The warp of the web is of black linen yarn; the hair weft is thrown with a long hooked boxwood shuttle, or a long rod having a catch hook at its end. The weaver passes the shuttle through the shuttle-way when it is opened by the treadles; a child presents a hair to the catch of the shuttle, and the weaver draws it through the shed and beats it up by two motions of the batten. The hairs are laid in a trough of water to keep them supple. The warp is dressed with paste, and the haircloth is well hot-calendered to give it luster.

haired, a. [Eng. hair; -ed.] Having hair, generally in composition; as, black-haired, light-haired, long-haired, &c.

hāl'-bërd, hāl'-bërt, *hol'-berd, s. [Old Fr. halebarde, from M. H. Ger. helmbarte, halenbarte; Ger. hellebarte=an ax to cleave a helmet, as if derived from Ger. helm=a helmet, and barte=a broadax. But the real meaning is a long-handled ax, from M. H. Ger. halme=a handle, barte=a broadax. (Skeat.)] A weapon formerly much used by soldiers, consisting of a pole about five feet in length, surmounted by a head of steel, partly crescent-shaped. The poleax was its prototype. It took a great variety of fanciful forms, and was occasionally decorated with gilding, the blade being frequently perforated with ornamental devices. It ultimately became a mere decorative weapon, to be used for display in public ceremonies, and as part of the paraphernalia of home troops, or palatial guardsmen.

Halberds.

¶ To send to the halberds: To cause to be flogged. The force of the expression lies in the fact that at one time soldiers were tied to halberds fixed in the ground to receive their punishment. (Voyle.)

halberd-headed, halbert-headed, halberd-shaped, a.

Bot.: [HASTATE.]

halberd-weed, s. Neurolema.

"Hurried from the halcyon cot, Where Innocence presides."

Cunningham: The Contemplatist.

halcyon bill, halcyon's bill, s. The bill of a kingfisher. It was an old superstition, which Browne, in his Vulgar Errors (bk. iii., ch. x.), says is "yet not made out by reason or experience," that the body of a kingfisher, hung up so as to move freely, would always turn its breast to the quarter whence the wind was blowing.

"But now, how stands the wind?

Into what corner peers my halcyon's bill?

Hal to the east? yes; see how stand the vanes?

East and by south."—Marlowe: Jew of Malta, i. 1.

halcyon-days, s. pl.

1. A time of happiness and prosperity. Halcyon is the Greek for a kingfisher, compounded of hals (the sea) and kyo (to brood on). The ancient Sicilians believed that the kingfisher laid its eggs and incubated for fourteen days, before the winter solstice, on the surface of the sea, during which time the waves of the sea were always unruined.

"The halcyons are of great name and much marked. They lay and sit about mid-winter when days are shortest, and the time whilst they are brooding is called the halcyon dates: for during that season the sea is calm and navigable, especially in the coast of Sicily."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. x., ch. xxxii.

2. Days or a time of peace, quiet, and tranquillity.

"If Anna's happy reign you praise, Pray, not a word, of halcyon-days."

Swift: Apollo's Edict.

hāl'-çy'-ö-ni'-än, a. [Eng. halcyon; -ian.] Halcyon, peaceful, calm, tranquil, quiet.

A. As adjective:

1. Whole, sound; in health and safety; not impaired in health.

"Last year we thought him strong and hale;

But now he's quite another thing."

Swift: On Death of Dr. Swift.

2. Whole, perfect, entire, unbroken, uninjured.

B. As subst.: Health, safety, welfare.

"All heedless of his dearest hale."

Spenser: Astropel, 103.

håle, *halen, *halie, *halien, v. t. & i. [A. S. holian, geholian=to acquire, get; cogn. with O. Sax. halôn=to bring, fetch; Dut. halen=to draw, pull; Dan. hale; Sw. hala; Ger. holen=to haul; O. H. Ger. holôn, halôn=to fetch.]

half-breed, s.

A. As substantive:

Anthropology:

1. Gen.: The offspring of parents of different races, though the term is usually confined to the children of one of the white race and a Red Indian.

"The French half-breeds at the Red River are a gigantic race."—Wilson: Prehistoric Man, ii. 262.

2. Spec. (pl.): Two tribes, one at Red River Settlement, chiefly employed in agriculture, the other subsisting by hunting. The rise of independent half-breed tribes is specially interesting, as it is "the first step toward the evolution of a distinct race." Whether more than the initiatory step will be taken seems problematical. Archdeacon Hunter, a Roman Catholic clergyman at Red River, states that though the offspring descended from mixed blood does not fail, it becomes very difficult to determine whether their descendants are whites or half-breeds, so that their absorption is apparently only a question of time.

"In the field . . . the superiority of the Half-breeds is strikingly manifest."—Wilson: Prehistoric Man, ii. 264.

B. As adjective:

1. Sprung from such a union as that described under A. 1.

2. Belonging to or connected with either of the tribes described under A. 2.

häll-lē-lū-jah, häll-lē-lū-ia, häll-lē-lū-iah (j and i as y), s. [Gr. Allelouia; Heb. Hallelu-Yah = Praise ye Jehovah.]

A. As substantive:

Scrip. & Ecclesiol.: An ascription of praise to God (see def.), occurring at the commencement of many psalms, as cvi., cxii., cxlii., &c. Hence it became a doxology in the Jewish synagogues. We read in the Book of Revelation that "much people in heaven" said Alleluia, as did the four and twenty elders and the four living creatures (Rev. xix. 1, 3, 4, 6), these coupling it with Amen. The verses just quoted aided Alleluia, or Hallelujah, in becoming what it now is, a doxology in the Christian church, though the meaning is unknown to many who at times use it as an ejaculation.

"In those days, as St. Jerome tells us, any one as he walked in the fields, might hear the plowman at his hallelujahs."—Sharp, vol. vii., ser. 4.

B. As adj.: Of, belonging to, containing, ejaculating, or singing hallelujahs.

"And tune the hallelujah song anew."—Byron: An Epistle to a Gentleman of the Temple.

hallelujah lass, s. The name given to those female officers and members of the Salvation Army who take part in the public services of that body.

häll-lē-lū-jāt-ic (j as y), a. [Heb. hallelujah, t euphonic, and suff. -ic.] Of or belonging to hallelujahs, or to sacred compositions containing them.

häll-liard (i as y), s. [HALYARD.]

*häll-li-dôme, s. [HALIDOME.]

*häll-liôn (i as y), *häll-yôn, s. [Etym. doubtful; cf. scullion.]

1. A rogue, a worthless fellow. (Scott: Rob Roy, ch. iv.)

2. A clown, a boor. (Davidson: Seasons, p. 26.)

3. A gentleman's servant out of livery.

4. An overbearing and quarrelsome woman.

häll-lite, s. [Named from Halle, in a garden of which town it was first found in 1830.]

Min.: The same as ALUMINITE (Dana), a mineral for which the Brit. Mus. Cat. prefers the name Websterite (q. v.).

*häll-môte, *häll-môte, s. [Eng. hall, and mote.] A court, now called a court-baron (q. v.).

häll-loö, hal-loa, hal-low, hol-lo, v. i. & t. [HALLOO, s.]

A. Intransitive:

1. To cry or call out with a loud voice; to cry halloo in order to attract attention.

"I'll tarry till my son come: he hallooed but even now."—Shakesp.: Winter's Tale, iv. 3.

2. To call after dogs to encourage them; to cheer dogs on with cries.

"The shepherd him pursues, and to his dog doth halloo."—Drayton: Polyolbion, s. 13.

B. Transitive:

1. To call out loudly; to shout out.

"Hallowing your name to the reverberate hills."—Shakesp.: Twelfth Night, i. 5.

*2. To shout or call out loudly to.

"He that first lights on him Halloo the other."—Shakesp.: Lear, iii. 1.

*3. To chase with shouts.

"Halloo me like a hare."—Shakesp.: Coriolanus, i. 8.

*4. To encourage with shouts; to cheer or urge on.

"He halloos on the whole pack against me."—Dryden: Vindication of the Duke of Guise.

häll-loö, interj. & c. [According to Skeat, from A. S. eald=ah lo! But cf. F. halle=a cheering or setting on a dog; haller=to hallow or encourage dogs with hallowing (Cotgrave); Ger. halloh.]

A. As interj.: An exclamation to call attention; a loud shout; a call to cheer on dogs while hunting.

B. As subst.: A cry to attract attention or to cheer on dogs.

"They got again into their canoes; gave us some halloos; flourished their weapons."—Cook: Voyage, bk. iii., ch. iv.

häll-lö-týpe, s. [First element doubtful; Eng. type (q. v.).]

Phot.: The same as HELLENOTYPE (q. v.).

häll-löw, *halghien, *hal-ewe, *hal-ow, *hal-owe, *hal-we, v. t. [A. S. hālgian=to make holy; hālig=holy. Wallis, more than two hundred years ago, said of this word fore desuevit (it has almost fallen into disuse), but such language would be out of place now. (Trench: English Past and Present.)]

[HOLY.]

1. To make holy; to consecrate; to set apart or dedicate for holy or religious purposes or uses; to sanctify.

"To dedicate and halowe the monastery of Seynt Denys."—Fabyan, vol. i., ch. xxxiii.

2. To make sacred or worthy of reverence.

"Of lofty hopes, he to the world went forth
A favored being, knowing no desire Which genius did not halloo."—Wordsworth: Left upon a Seat.

3. To reverence as holy; to revere.

"Hallowed be thy name."—Matthew vi. 9.

*4. To bless.

"There they were wed and hallowed of the priest."—A. C. Swinburne: Tristram of Lyonesse, ii.

*häll-löw, *hal-owe, *hal-we, s. [A. S. hālg, def. form of hālig=holy.] A saint.

"They may not please hem [God]: ne non of his halowes."—Chaucer: Persones Tale.

Häll-löw-e-ën, s. [An abbreviation for Alle halowene tide=All hallow's tide; halowene=gen. pl. of Mid. Eng. halowe, or halwe=a saint.] The eve or vigil of the feast of All Hallows or All Saints.

Häll-löw-mäs, s. [An abbreviation for All Hallow Mass=the mass or feast of All Hallows or All Saints.] The feast of All Hallows or All Saints, celebrated on November 1.

"She came adorned hither like sweet May, Sent back like Hallowmas, or short'st of day."—Shakesp.: Richard II., v. 2.

*Hallowmaas-rade, s. The name given to a general assembly of warlocks and witches, formerly believed by the vulgar to have been held at this season. (Cromek: Remains of Nithsdale Song, p. 283.)

häll-löy-site, häll-löy-lite, s. [Named after Dr. d'Halloy, a French geologist.]

Min.: A clayey or earthy mineral, white, grayish, greenish, yellowish, bluish, or reddish; opaque or translucent, and of pearly to dull luster. Hardness, 14-2; specific gravity, 1.8-2.4. Composition: Silica, 37.12-39.50; alumina, 22.05-41.27; water, 16.0-26.5, &c. Dana recognizes four varieties: (1) Ordinary Halloysite, including Galepactite, Pseudosteateite, and Glagerite; (2) Smectite, (3) Lenzinite, and (4) Bole, all which see. Occurs in many places in veins or beds of ore, or in granite. (Dana, &c.)

Häll-städt, s. & a. [See def., A.]

A. As substantive:

Geog.: A market town in Upper Austria, built on the west side of the Lake of Hallstadt.

B. As adj.: Of or belonging to the place mentioned under A.

Hallstadt-beds, s. pl.

Geol.: Certain strata on the northern flank of the Austrian Alps, corresponding to the St. Cassian beds on their southern declivity. Thickness 800 to 1,000 feet. Age Upper Trias. Fossils more than 800; marine fossils chiefly mollusks. (Lyell, &c.)

häll-lū-cin-āte, v. i. [Lat. hallucinatus, pa. par. of hallucino=to wander in mind, to rave.] To wander in mind, to err, to blunder, to stumble.

häll-lū-cin-ā-tion, s. [Lat. hallucinatio, allucinatio, from hallucino, allucino=to wander in mind.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A wandering in the mind; a mistake; a blunder.

"This must have been the hallucination of the transcriber."—Addison.

*2. A defective or impaired state of the vision.

II. Physiol.: Delusion (q. v.); belief in the existence of things which have no real existence. Deaf people hear sounds and blind see visions. No person can convince an insane person that the sounds he believes he hears, or that the forms he believes he sees, are other than real and substantial the hallucination being the false conception which he is unable to distinguish from a true perception. [ILLUSION.] Vertigo, or dizziness, presents a vivid hallucination of movement either of the body of the person suffering from it or of things surrounding him which are really at rest. Double vision, in a certain stage of drunkenness, partakes of this nature, though it is rather an illusion than a hallucination.

häll-lū-cin-ā-tör, s. [Lat.] One who is under the influence of hallucinations; a blunderer.

häll-lū-cin-ā-tör-ý, a. [Latin hallucinator.] Pertaining to or of the nature of hallucinations.

Zoöl.: Phacochærus or Phacochærus æliani, or an allied species of wart-hog, occurring in Abyssinia. [WART-HOG.]

häll-lūx, s. [Lat. allex=the thumb, or great toe.]

Anatomy:

1. Human: The great toe.

2. Comp.: The innermost of the five normal digits of a vertebrate foot. (Huxley.)

*hålm (l silent), s. [HAULM.]

halm-grass, s.

Bot.: (1) Elymus arenarius; (2) Carex arenaria.

häll-mä, s. [Gr. halma, from halesthai=to leap.] Greek antiq.: One of the exercises at the Pantheon; the long jump with weights in the hand.

häll-mā-lille, s. [Ceylonese (?)].

Bot.: Berrya ammonilla. [BERRYA.]

häll-mā-tür-üs, s. [Gr. halma=a spring, a leap, a bound; hallowai=to leap, and oura=tail.]

Zoöl.: A sub-genus of kangaroos, genus Macropus. Halmaturus or M. antilopinus, the Antelopian kangaroo; has short, stiff horns like those of some antelopes. It inhabits the north of Australia. Halmaturus elegans (Macropus ruficollis) is the red-necked kangaroo of New South Wales.

hā-lō, s. [Lat. halos (genit. and accus. halo)=Gr. halos=a round threshing-floor, the disc of the sun or moon or of a shield; a halo.]

1. Literally:

Physics & Meteor.: A circle round an object when the latter is steadily looked at. The impression of the halo is opposite to that of the object, so that, if the object is bright, the halo is dark, and vice versa. Halos are of two types, encircling and fäte, fät, färe, amidst, whät, fäll, father; wē, wēt, hère, camel, hēr, thère; plne, plt, sire, sir, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whò, sòn; mäte, cüb, cüre, unite, cūr, räle, füll; trý, Sýrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ä. qu = kw.

opposite; the former including simple halos, compound halos or halo systems, and finally coronas; the latter comprehending rainbows, fog-bows, and mist or mountain speckers. The word is often used in connection with the moon and the sun. Halos round these heavenly bodies consist of colored light, produced by the refraction of the light passing from the luminary through the surrounding haze.

2. Fig.: An ideal glory investing an object.

"Glory's self is twilight, and displays
A melancholy halo."—Byron: Child Harold, iv. 165.

hāl-lō, v. t. & i. [HALO, s.]

A. Trans.: To surround with or as with a halo.

"Like yonder spots of our roadside lamps, Haloed about with the common's damps."

R. Browning: Christmas Eve, iv.

B. Intrans.: To form into a halo; to surround as a halo.

"The fire
That haloed round his saintly brow."

Southey: Thalaba, bk. ix.

hāl-ō-bā-tēs, s. [Gr. hals (genit. halos) = the sea, and bates=one that treads or covers; bainō=to walk, to go.]

Entom.: A genus of Heteroptera, family Nepidae. It is found on the surface of the sea within the tropics, often far from land. (Swainson & Shuckard.)

hāl-lōed, a. [Eng. halo; -ed.] Surrounded with or as with a halo.

"Elicit from the gloom some haloed face bending over me with strange pity."—C. Brontë: Jane Eyre, ch. ii.

hāl-ō-gēn, s. [Gr. hals=salt, and gennaō=to produce.]

Chem.: The electro-negative radical of a haloid salt. This term is also used for the monad elements chlorine, bromine, iodine, and fluorine, as their sodium salts resemble sea salt, which is chloride of sodium, NaCl. The physical properties of Cl, Br, and I, correspond with the difference of their atomic weights, Cl 35.5, Br 80, and I 127, the weight of bromine vapor being the mean of that of chlorine and iodine. Chloride is a gas, bromine a liquid, and iodine a solid at ordinary temperatures. Chlorine has the greatest chemical affinity for hydrogen, and iodine for oxygen, that of bromine being intermediate.

ha-lōg-ēn-ōis, a. [Eng., &c., halogen (q. v.); -ous.] Belonging to or in any way connected with the halogens; generating haloid salts.

hāl-ōg-ē-tōn, s. [Gr. hals=the sea, and geitōn=a neighbor.]

Bot.: A genus of Chenopods. Halogeton tamariscifolium, a native of North America, is called Spanish Worm-seed, and is a powerful anthelmintic.

hāl-lōid, a. & s. [Gr. hals=salt, and eidos=form.]

A. As adjective:

Chem.: A name given to salts formed by the union of a halogen element with a metal, as NaCl sodium chloride, or by the union of a radical which does not contain oxygen with a metal, as KCN, cyanide of potassium.

B. As subst.: A haloid salt.

ha-lōm-ē-tēr, s. [Gr. hals (genit. halos)=salt, and metron=a measure.] An instrument for measuring the forms and angles of salts and crystals. [GONTIOMETER.]

ha-lō-nī-a, s. [Gr. halōnia=a threshing floor.] Palæobotany: A genus of fossil plants proposed by Lindley and Hutton, and adopted by Unger, &c., for stems having a surface like that of Lepidodendron combined with the branching of the Coniferae. But in 1848 Mr. John S. Dawes, F. G. S., showed that the branching was really dichotomous like Lepidodendron itself. They are now regarded as Lycopodiaceae.

hāl-ō-phyte, s. [Gr. hals (genit. halos)=the sea, and phyton=a plant.]

Botan. Geog.: A plant growing in a salt marsh, and producing soda salts. Examples, Salicornia, Salsola, &c. Halophytes is not a term used in classification, the salt-marsh plants being devoid of affinity to each other.

hāl-ō-ra-gā-gē-æ, hāl-ō-rā-gē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. halorag(is); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -ææ.]

Bot.: Hippurids. An order of epigynous exogens, alliance Myrtales. It consists of herbaceous plants or under shrubs, with alternate, opposite, or whorled leaves; small flowers, either axillary or in terminal panicles; the calyx adherent, its limb two to four-toothed or undivided; petals inserted into the summit of the calyx or absent; stamens inserted in the same place, as many as the petals or fewer; ovary inferior; style none; stigma papillose or pencil-formed; fruit dry, indehiscent, membranous or bony, with one or more cells; seed solitary, pendulous. The species, which are scattered over the world, are generally found in wet places. Genera described eight, species seventy. The order may be a degenerate state of Onagraceæ. It has two tribes, Haloragaceæ and Trapeæ (q. v.).

hāl-ō-rā-gē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. halorag(is); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -ææ.]

Botany:

1. The typical tribe of Haloragaceæ (q. v.).

2. The same as HALORAGACEÆ (q. v.).

hāl-ō-rā-gīs, s. [Gr. hals (genit. halos) = the sea, and rhag (genit. rhagos) = a berry, a grape.]

Bot.: The typical genus of the tribe Haloragaceæ and the order Haloragaceæ (q. v.). Haloragis citriodora is fragrant.

hāl-lō-skōpe, s. [Eng. halo, and Gr. skopeō=to view, to see.]

Optics: An instrument invented by M. Bravais for exhibiting the phenomena connected with halos, perihelia, &c. It comprises prisms and a mirror, which revolve rapidly about an axis, and two plates of glass for intercepting the light. The rotating prisms receive the light from a lamp in a darkened chamber, the refracted rays assuming the form of the perihelion circle.

hāl-ōt-rich-ite, hāl-ōt-rich-ine, s. & a. [Gr. hals (genit. halos)=salt, and thrix (genit. trichos)=hair.]

A. As substantive:

Mineralogy:

1. Of the form Halotrichite:

(1) Halotrichite of Glocker: A yellowish white mineral, with silky fibers and an inky astringent taste. Composition: Sulphuric acid, 35.9; alumina, 11.5; protoxide of iron, 8.1; water, 44.5=100.

(2) Halotrichite of Hausmann: The same as Alunogen.

2. Of the form Halotrichine: A silky ashen mineral from the Solfatara, near Naples. (Dana.)

B. As adj.: Of or belonging to the minerals described under A.

[Dana has a Halotrichite group of minerals including Mendozite, Pickeringite, Apjohnite, Bosjemanite, and Halotrichite (q. v.).

hāls, halse, s. [A. S. hæls, hæls; Goth., O. Fris., O. S., O. H. Ger., Dan., & Sw. hals; Icel. háls.]

1. Ord. Lang. (of both forms): The neck, the throat.

2. Naut. (of the form halse): One of the holes at the head of a ship, through which the cable runs; a hawse (q. v.).

"Thou hast founde them eightene yeres, with their armes abroad to halse thee."—Golden Bock, ch. xlv.

2. Naut.: To hoist, to draw up.

"Bomilcar . . . halsed up sails, and away he went."—P. Holland: Livius, p. 568.

hālse (2), halsien, v. t. [A. S. hālsian, hælsian; O. H. Ger. heilison; Icel. heilsa.]

1. To beseech, to adjure.

2. To greet, to salute.

hāl-sen-ing, a. [English hals=the throat.] Sounding harshly; inharmonious or discordant in the throat.

"This ill halsening horny name hath, as Cornuto in Italy, opened a gap to the scoffs of many."—Carew.

hāl-sēr (1 silent), hāl-stēr, hāw-sēr, s. [HALSE, s.] A large rope; a small cable; a hawser (q. v.).

"And ships secure without their halsers ride."

Pope: Homer's Odyssey, xlii. 121.

hālt (1), v. t. [HALT, a.]

1. To limp; to be lame.

"The hors, on whiche she rode was blacke,
And halted."—Gower: C. A., iv.

2. To linger, to loiter; to hesitate; to stand in doubt.

"How long halt ye between two opinions?"—1 Kings xviii. 21.

3. To be defective; to fall or come short; to be faulty in measure or rhythm; to fail in connection of ideas, &c.

"The verse

hâ-mêl-i-dâ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. hameli(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -ideæ.]

Bot.: A family of Cinchonaceæ, tribe Cinchonæ.

hâmes, s. pl. An old Lincolnshire name for a flail, an instrument for threshing or beating grain from the ear by hand. The old saying, "to set the thames on fire," takes its origin from this word, and has nothing whatever to do with the river Thames. It was first used with reference to a man who was locally known as a braggart, a man who did considerably more talking than working. Hence, "He'll never set t'hames on fire," meant he will never whirl the hames or flails fast enough to set them on fire.

hâme-sûck-en, s. [Icel. heimsókn=an attack on one's house; A. S. hâm=house, and secan=to seek.]

Scots Law: The offense of feloniously beating or assaulting a person in his own house or dwelling-place.

Hâm-il-tô-ni-an, a. [See def.]

1. Gen.: Of or belonging to any person of the name of Hamilton.

2. Spec.: (See the compound.)

Hamiltonian-system, s. The name given to the system of teaching languages popularized by James Hamilton, though it was known long before his day, and was recommended by Locke in his Thoughts Concerning Education.

hâ-mite (1), hâ-mi'-têg, s. [Latin hamus=a hook; suff. -ite (Palæont.) (q. v.).]

Palæontology:

1. (Of the form Hamites) A genus of cephalopod mollusks, family Ammonitidæ. The shell is hook-shaped, or bent upon itself more than once; the courses separate. Fifty-eight species are known, from the Neocomian to the Chalk. Found in strata in Europe, India, and South America. (S. P. Woodward.)

2. (Of the form Hamite) The English name for any fossil shell of the genus Hamites [1].

Hâm'-ite (2), s. [Hebrew Chham=as adj., warm, hot; as subst., Ham, the youngest son of Noah; -ite.] A descendant of Ham, a negro, an Ethiopian.

Hamadryas.

Hamites.

fâte, fât, färe, amidst, whât, fäll, father; wê, wêt, hêre, camel, hêr, thêre; pine, pît, sîre, sîr, marine; gô, pô, or, wôre, wôlf, wôrk, whô, sôn; mûte, cûb, cûre, unite, cûr, rûle, fûll; trÿ, sÿrian. æ, œ = ê; ey = â. qu = kw.

Hām-it'-ic, a. [Eng., &c., Hamit(e); -ic.]

Ethnol. & Philol.: Of or belonging to Ham, his descendants or their languages. The name corresponds to the term Semitic for the Syro-Arabian languages, but there is difficulty in connection with both, for Canaan was the son of Ham, but his descendants apparently spoke Phœnician, which was not an Hamitic, but a Semitic tongue. The term is sometimes used for the great but imperfectly known family of distinctively African languages.

hām'-kin, s. [Ety. doubtful.] A pudding made of a shoulder of mutton.

hām'-lēt, *hame-lest, *hame-lat, *hame-lette, *ham-il-let, s. [O. Fr. hamel; dimin. suff. -et; O. Fr. ham=a home; cogn. with A. S. hām=Eng. home.] A small village; a little cluster of houses in the country. (Tennyson: Death of Wellington, vii.)

I. Ordinary Language:1. Literally:

(1) A tool or instrument for driving nails, beating metals, &c., and consisting of an iron or steel head fixed crosswise on a handle.

(2) Anything resembling a hammer in its shape, action, or use, as the striker of a clock.

(2) Fig.: Anything destructive, overwhelming, or ruining.

II. Technically:

1. Firearms: Formerly, the hammer of the flint-lock was the steel cover of the priming-pan, and the parts connected therewith which received the blow of the flint which was held in the cock. The hammer of the percussion-lock is the striking part itself.

2. Machines: In addition to the hand implement called a hammer, large ones moved by machinery are used in manufactories. Thus there are power-hammers and steam-hammers, the former moved by any potent natural agent, as water or steam; the latter specifically by steam.

3. Music: A small padded mallet by which the string of a piano is struck.

† (1) Geological hammer:

Geol.: A hammer suited for the use of geologists. At least two such implements are required—one for rough-hewing specimens, the other for reducing them to smaller dimensions. The first should have a heavy head, with one end wedge-shaped, the other flat and square or rounded. The material should be Swedish iron, with well-tempered but not brittle steel ends welded on. The shaft should be thirteen, fourteen, or more inches long. (Rutley.)

(2) Hammer and tongs: Violently.

"Mr. Malone fell upon them hammer and tongs."—H. Kingsley: Ravenshoe, ch. ix.

(3) To bring to the hammer: To put up at auction.

hammer-ax, s. A double tool, having a hammer at one side of the handle and an ax at the other.

hammer-beam, s.

Arch.: A beam in Gothic architecture which projects from the wall and forms a sort of bracket-support for the tie-beams of an ornamental roof. Hammer-beams never extend across an apartment; and their ends are commonly decorated with carvings, very frequently representing emblazoned shields. They are often used also in the principals of Gothic roofs to strengthen the framing and to diminish the lateral pressure that falls upon the walls. The hammer-beam is generally supported by a rib rising up from a corbel below, and in its turn forms the support of another rib, which, with that springing from the hammer-beam on the opposite side, constitutes an arch.

Hammer-beam roof: A roof, the feet of the principal rafters of which are connected by a tie-beam, but usually rest in corbels. Half-rafters, carrying a vaulted superstructure, usually span the severy.

hammer-catcher, s.

Music: A padded shoulder which catches the hammer on its return.

hammer-cloth, s.

Carriage: The cloth which covers a coach-box; so called from the old practice of carrying a hammer, nails, &c., in the box of the seat, or from hamper; but, according to Skeat, hammer is here an adaptation of Dutch hemel=(1) heaven, (2) a tester, a covering; cogn. with Sw., Dan. & Ger. him-mel=(1) heaven, (2) a tester.

hammer-dressed, a.

Mason: Dressed or prepared with a hammer; specifically applied to building-stone dressed with a pointed hammer or pick.

hammer-engine, s.

Mach.: A variety of the direct acting vertical steam engine, in which the supporting frame resembles that of a steam hammer.

hammer-fish, s. [Hammer-headed shark.] hammer-harden, hammer-hard, v. t. To beat metal with a hammer while cold, to close the pores and condense the texture.

"Hammer-hard is when you harden iron or steel with much hammering on it."—Mozon.

hammer-head, s.

1. Ord. Lang.: The cross piece of iron forming the head of a hammer.

"Because it was fashioned like a little mallet or hammer-head, it was, and is at this day called in Latine malleolus."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. xvii, ch. xxii.

2. Zool.: The same as HAMMER-FISH (q. v.).

hammer-headed, a.

Zool.: Having a head resembling a hammer.

† (1) Hammer-headed bat:

Zool.: Myotis monstrosus, closely allied to White's Fruit Bat, but differing from all other Pteropine bats in the extraordinary size and shape of its head, which, owing to the muzzle being enormously developed, has a hammer-like appearance. It was discovered by Du Chaillu in Western Africa, and described by Dr. Allen, of Philadelphia. (Duncan.)

(2) Hammer-headed shark:

Zool.: A fish, Zygana malleus, and the genus Zygana itself. The sides of the head are greatly produced in a horizontal direction. Sometimes called Hammer-fish.

hammer-man, s. One who beats or works metal with a hammer; one who has charge of all that relates to the mechanical treatment of iron by the hammer.

hammer-mark, s. A mark of the hammer, left from forging.

hammer-oyster, s.

Zool.: The molluscous genus Malleus, and especially Malleus vulgaris. It is not of the genuine Oyster family (Ostreidae), but is one of the Aviculidae. When young it is like an ordinary Avicula, but, as it advances in age, the two ears lengthen more and more, so as to be always increasingly hammer-like. It inhabits the Indian Archipelago.

hammer-sedge, s.

Bot.: Carex hirta.

hammer-slag, s.

Metal: The coating of oxide of iron formed on iron by heat, which is removed by hammering the metal when cold. "It is black, opaque, slightly metallic in luster, melts at a high temperature, and is strongly magnetic." (Percy.)

hammer-stone, s.Anthropology:

1. A stone implement held in the hand and used as a hammer by the Neolithic flint-workers.

"The hammer-stones used in the manufacture of flint hatchets appear to have been usually quartzite pebbles."—Evans: Ancient Stone Implements, p. 29.

2. The name given to certain rare stone implements of Neolithic age from their resemblance to mining hammers. From their showing no traces of use, and their usual material, sandstone, being unsuitable for the purpose of hammering, perhaps, also, from their having been often found near lakes, they have come to be classed as sinkers for nets or fishing lines. Similar implements, but of granite or diorite, occur in the Ohio Valley; some of them are from three to four inches long. They show no signs of abrasion, and may have been used as bolas (q. v.), or, according to Evans (Ancient Stone Implements, ch. x.), as sinkers. But their use cannot be determined with certainty.

hammer-wort, s. The herb Pellitory. (Halliwel.)

hām'-mēr, v. t. & i. [HAMMER, s.]A. Transitive:*1. Literally:

1. To beat with a hammer.

2. To forge or form with a hammer; to shape by beating with a hammer.

"I had certainly been reduced to pay the public in hammered money, for want of milled."—Dryden: A Discourse on Epic Poetry.

II. Figuratively:

*1. To cause or produce with a hammer.

"And the smith his iron measures hammered to the anvil's chime." Longfellow: Nuremberg.

*2. To work out or forge in the mind with intellectual labor; to excogitate. (Generally followed by out.)

"Indeed, I sometimes hammered out a line."

Gay, Ep. 1, To a Lady.

*3. To patch up, to frame. (Followed by up.)

"Some spirits, by whom they were stirred and guided in the name of the people, hammered up the articles."—Hayward.

B. Intransitive:1. Literally:

1. To work with a hammer.

2. To make a noise like a hammer; to act as a hammer; to beat.

"Round him busily hewed and hammered"

Mallet huge and heavy ax."

Longfellow: Musician's Tale.

II. Figuratively:

1. To be busy in thought; to be working or pondering in the mind.

"Nor need'st thou much importune me to that,"

Whereon this month I have been hammering."

Shakespeare: Two Gentlemen of Verona, i. 3.

2. To be in agitation or debate.

"A thousand things are hammering in his head."—Dryden: Sir Martin Marr-all, l. 1.

3. To attack persistently. (Followed by at.)

"Better to clear prime forests"

Than hammer at this reverend gentlewoman."

Tennyson: Prince of Arden, iii. 113.

hām'-mēr-a-ble, a. [English hammer; -able.] That may or can be fashioned or formed with a hammer; malleable.

hām'-mēr-ēr, s. [Eng. hammer; -er.] One who works with a hammer; a hammer-man.

hām'-mēr-ing, pr. par., a. & s. [HAMMER, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As substantive:

1. Lit.: The act or art of beating, forging, or forming with a hammer.

2. Fig.: A constant beating, working, or agitation. (P. Holland: Plutarch, p. 833.)

hām'-mēr-lēss, a. [Eng. hammer; -less.]

Firearms: Used in connection with a tolerably recent pattern of gun, in which the hammer is not visible. From outward appearances the gun appears to be hammerless, but this is not really so, the hammer or cock being simply sunk into the stock.

hām'-mōck, *ha-ma-ca, *ha-mac-ca, s. [Sp. hamaca; cf. O. Dut. hammak. Originally Carib or Brazilian Indian (†).]

1. Originally: A kind of suspended bed made of manila, sea-grass, or other fiber network.

"A great many Indians came for the purpose of bartering their cotton and hammacs or nets in which they sleep."—Columbus: First Voyage.

2. Naut.: A kind of hanging or swinging bed formed of canvas, about six feet by four, suspended by lanyards from rings in the deck beams.

"Then swift descending with a seaman's haste, Slips to his hammock and forgets the blast,"

Cowper: Retirement, 436.

3. As used now on shore: A swinging or suspended bed made of canvas or network, and hung by hooks or other contrivance from the roof, ceiling, a tree, &c.

hammock-battens, hammock-racks, s. pl.

Naut.: Cleats or battens from which the hammocks are suspended.

hammock-nettings, s. pl.

Naut.: A row of forked, upright, iron stanchions, supporting a netting or wooden trough, in which the seamen stow their hammocks during the day.

Hanseatic-league, s.

Hist.: A celebrated confederacy formed in the thirteenth century between certain commercial towns, with the view at once of restraining the rapacity of kings and nobles, and clearing the Elbe, the German Ocean, and other places from the pirates and robbers by which they were then infested. It began on a small scale in 1239, when Hamburg entered into an alliance with Ditmarsch and the district of Hadeln, Lübeck in 1241 being added to the League. Brunswick came into it in 1247, other towns following at irregular intervals. The confederated towns or cities were arranged in four divisions, the chief places in each being Lübeck, Cologne, Brunswick, and Danzig. Becoming powerful, the League concluded treaties with monarchs, raised troops, and made war, as if it had been an independent political power. At the time when the League flourished most, it consisted of eighty-five confederated towns. In 1246 it established a factory in London, called the Steelyard. It had other factories over Europe, the chief being at Bruges, Novgorod, and Bergen. It gave a powerful impulse to commerce, and when in 1631 it in large measure fell to pieces, it left behind various free republics which continued for a long period of time.

Shakesp.: Taming of the Shrew, iv. 4.

2. By good fortune; by good luck; luckily, fortunately.

"Happily the principles of human nature afford abundant security that such theories will never be more than theories."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. ii.

3. In a happy manner, state, or condition; in a state of happiness.

"Indeed it is impossible to live without caring, at least to live happily."—Sharp: Sermons, vol. iv., ser. I.

4. With address, skill, or dexterity; gracefully.

hāp-pi-ness, *hap-pi-nesse, s. [Eng. happy; -ness.]

1. Good luck, good fortune.

2. The quality or state of being happy; felicity; a state in which all desires are satisfied; the pleasurable sensations arising from the gratification of all desires, and the enjoyment of pleasure without pain.

"Any condition may be denominated happy in which the amount or aggregate of pleasure exceeds that of pain: and the degree of happiness depends upon the quantity of this excess."—Paley: Moral Philosophy, bk. i., ch. vi.

3. Fortuitous elegance, unstudied grace.

¶ Happiness admits of degrees, since every individual is placed in different circumstances, either of body or mind, which fit him to be more or less happy. Felicity is not regarded in the same light; it is that which is positive and independent of all circumstances: domestic felicity and conjugal felicity are regarded as moral enjoyments, abstracted from everything which can serve as an alloy. (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

hāp-pý, *hap-pie, *hap-pye, s. [Eng. hap=chance, luck; -y.]

- *1. Lucky, fortunate.

2. Prosperous, successful; in prosperous or fortunate circumstances.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāl, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mātē, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trý, Sýrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

8. Favorable, fortunate, lucky, prosperous; as, a happy omen.

"Ports and happy havens."

Shakesp.: Richard II., i. 3.

9. Dexterous, ready, skillful.

Happy and fortunate are both applied to the external circumstances of a man; but the former conveys the idea of that which is abstractedly good, the latter implies rather what is agreeable to one's wishes. A man is happy in his marriage, in his children, in his connections, and the like: he is fortunate in his trading concerns. Happy excludes the idea of chance; fortunate excludes the idea of personal effort: a man is happy in the possession of what he gets; he is fortunate in getting it. In the improper sense they bear a similar analogy. (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

† (1) Happy man be his dole: [DOLE, s.]
 (2) Happy-go-lucky: Careless, thoughtless, improvident.

"In the happy-go-lucky way of his class."—Reade: Never Too Late to Mend, ch. xv.

23. Done in, or given to, excess; as, hard drinking, a hard drinker.

II. Technically:

1. Physics: Offering a relatively great resistance to any other thing brought in contact with it. [HARDNESS.]

2. Grammar:

(1) Applied to the sound of c, as in can, g, as in goat, or ch, as in chemical, as distinguished from the sounds of the same letters in city, gin, and church.

(2) Applied to the consonants f, k, p, s, and t, and the sound of th in thin, which can be pronounced without any voice sound, as distinguished from the consonants v, g (as in gate), b, d, z, and th in thine, which cannot be so pronounced.

3. Art: This term, as applied to a work of art, designates that rigidity of drawing which characterizes the works of the mediæval artists. It is also applied to coloring, when a want of softness and delicacy is apparent in a picture. It is generally used to designate a style which rejects the grace, and too rigidly adheres to the mere mechanism of art.

4. Manège: Insensible to the action of the bit; as, a hard mouth.

B. As adverb:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. With force, energy, or vigor; vigorously, energetically, earnestly, diligently.

"Alas, now pray you

Work not so hard."—Shakespeare: Tempest, iii. 1.

C. As substantive:

1. Trouble, adversity.

2. A ford or passage across a river.

3. A hard bottom of gravel laid across a swamp or at a muddy boat-landing.

4. A pier or landing-place on a river.

5. An esplanade or paved roadway by the seaside.

(1) Hard and solid respect the internal constitution of bodies, and the adherence of the component parts; but hard denotes a much closer degree of adherence than solid. Wood is always a solid body, but it is sometimes hard and sometimes soft; water, when congealed, is a solid body, and admits of different degrees of hardness. In the improper application, hardness is allied to insensibility; firmness to fixedness; solidity to substantiality: a hard man is not to be acted upon by any tender motives; a firm man is not to be turned from his purpose; a solid man holds no purposes that are not well founded.

(2) Hard is a much stronger term than difficult, which signifies merely not easy. Hard is therefore positive, and difficult negative. A difficult task cannot be got through without exertion, but a hard task requires great exertion. (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

(3) Hard by: Close or near at hand (adv. & prep.).

(4) Hard up: In want of money; needy; in urgent want of something.

"And harlotrie they tolden bothe two."
Chaucer: C. T., 3, 164.

narm. *harme, *harm, s. [A. S. hearm, harm = grief, harm; cogn. with Icel. harmr = grief; Dan. harm = wroth; Sw. harm = anger, grief; Ger. harm; Russ. srame = shame; Sansc. grama = toil, fatigue; Græc. to be weary.]

1. Bodily, physical, or material hurt or injury; damage.

"And thou couldst laugh away the fear of harm."
Cowper: Expostulation, 705.

2. Moral wrong; evil, mischief, wrong-doing.

"A price being paid for the harm we have done."—Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, pt. ii.

¶ For the difference between harm and evil, see EVIL.

harm-doing, s. Wrong, evil, wrong-doing.

"No tongue could ever Pronounce dishonor of her; by my life
 She never knew harm-doing."
Shakespeare: Henry VIII., ii. 3.

harm, *harme, *harm-en, *hear-min, v. t. & i. [HARM, s.]

A. Trans.: To do harm, hurt, injury, or damage to; to hurt, to injure, to damage morally or physically.

"Yet wer I innocent and one that harme no man."—Udall: John viii.

B. Intrans.: To do harm, injury, or damage.

har-ma-line, s. [Mod. Lat. harmala(a); -ine.]

Chem.: $C_{13}H_{12}N_2O$. An alkaloid contained in Peganum harmala, a plant growing in the Crimea.

The seed coating contains Harmaline and Harmine. They are extracted by dilute sulphuric acid, and then precipitated by a solution of NaCl, in the form of chlorides; the alkaloids may be separated by adding ammonia, the harmine being first precipitated. Harmaline can be converted into harmine by the action of oxidizing agents. Harmaline forms yellow bitter salts.

har-mât-tan, s. [Arab., said to be originally from the Fanti language, in Western Africa; Fr. harmattan; Sp. harmatan; Ital. armatano.] A dry hot wind blowing from the interior of Africa to the Atlantic, between Cape Verde, in 14° 43' N., and Cape Lopez, 0° 36' S., in December, January, and February.

It is generally attended by fog, through which the sun shines red. It hurts vegetation and prejudicially affects man, drying up the eyes, the mouth, &c., even peeling off the skin. On the other hand, it tends to terminate fever and dysentery, and to mitigate cutaneous diseases. It corresponds to the sirocco of Italy, and, to a certain extent, to the Indian and Australian hot wind. [HOT WIND, SIROCCO.] har-mêl, s. [Arab.]

Bot.: Peganum harmala, a strongly scented plant, common in Southern Europe and Asia Minor. The Turks use the seeds as a spice and to make a red dye.

harm-fûl, *harm-full, *harme-full, a. [Eng. harm; -ful(l).] Hurtful; injurious; detrimental; causing or tending to cause harm or damage.

"But not without that harmful stroke."
Shakespeare: Lear, iv. 2.

harm-fûl-lý, *harme-ful-ly, *harm-ful-lie, adv. [Eng. harmful; -ly.] In a harmful, hurtful, or injurious manner; so as to cause harm, hurt, or injury; hurtfully; injuriously.

"Spending his time not only vainly, but harmfully, in such kind of exercise."—Ascham: Schoolmaster, pt. ii.

harm-fûl-nëss, s. [Eng. harmful; -ness.] The quality or state of being harmful; hurtfulness.

har-mine, s. [Eng., &c., harm(aline); -ine.]

Chem.: $C_{13}H_{12}N_2O$. An alkaloid contained in Peganum harmala, along with Harmaline (q. v.).

Harmine is insoluble in water and forms colorless salts.

harm-lëss, *harme-less, *harm-les, a. [Eng. harm; -less.]

1. Free from power, tendency, or desire to harm; not hurtful or injurious; innocuous; innocent.

"So Eden was a scene of harmless sport,
 Where kindness on his part who ruled the whole Begat a tranquil confidence in all."
Cowper: Task, vi. 364.

2. Free from harm, hurt, or damage; unhurt, uninjured, undamaged; as, to hold a person harmless.

harm-lëss-lý, *harm-les-ly, adv. [Eng. harmless; -ly.] In a harmless manner; innocently; innocuously; without causing or receiving injury.

"Unnumbered pleasures harmlessly pursued."
Cowper: Retirement, 784.

harm-lëss-nëss, s. [Eng. harmless; -ness.] The quality or state of being harmless; innocuousness; innocence.

"Its harmlessness or malignity is the only matter of enquiry."—Warburton: Divine Legation. (Pref.)

har-mô-ni-a, Har-mô-ni-a, s. [Of the form harmonia; Gr. harmonia, here=a means of joining, a fastening; of the form Harmonia (Def. 3.)]

[HARMONY.]

1. Anat.: The term employed to denote the simple apposition of comparatively smooth surfaces or edges, as in the case of the two superior maxillary bones.

2. Astron. (of the form Harmonia): An asteroid, the fortieth found. It was discovered by Goldschmidt on March 1, 1856.

3. Class. Mythol.: A daughter of Mars and Venus, who became the wife of Cadmus. Called also Harmonie and Hermione.

har-môn-ic, *har-môn-ick, a. & s. [Fr. harmonique, from Lat. harmonicus; Gr. harmonikos, from harmonia=harmony (q. v.).]

A. As adjective:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Of or pertaining to harmony or music.

2. Concordant; musical; harmonious; consonant.

"In full harmonic number joined."
Milton: P. L., iv. 687.

II. Technically:

1. Math.: Applied to numbers, terms of certain ratios, proportions, &c., which have certain relations or properties resembling those of musical concord.

[HARMONIC-PROPORTION.]

2. Music: Applied to the sounds produced by a vibrating string or column of air, when it is subdivided into its aliquot parts.

B. As substantive:

Music:

1. One of the sounds produced by a vibrating string or column of air, when it is subdivided into its aliquot parts.

2. An artificial tone produced in a stringed instrument (1) by varying the point of contact with the bow, or (2) by slightly pressing the string at the nodes or divisions of its aliquot parts ($\frac{1}{2}, \frac{1}{3}, \frac{1}{4}$, &c.).

In wind instruments, harmonics are produced by varying the intensity of the air-current from the mouth. [Grove.]

"These accessory sounds, which are caused by the aliquots of a sonorous body vibrating at once, are called harmonics."—Sir W. Jones: Essay on the Imitative Arts.

3. (Pl.) The science or doctrine of musical sounds.

harmonic-interval, s.

Music: The distance between two chords or between two consonant notes.

harmonic-proportion, s.

Math.: [HARMONICAL-PROPORTION.]

harmonic-scale, s.

Music: The scale formed by a series of natural harmonics.

harmonic-stops, s. pl.

Music: Organ stops, both flute and reed, having tubes twice the normal length, but pierced with a small hole in the middle. Harmonic flute stops are of great purity and brilliancy; they are of eight or four feet pitch. Harmonic piccolos are of two feet pitch.

Harmonic reed stops (tromba, tuba, trumpet, &c.) are generally on a high pressure of wind, one of the great advantages of all harmonic stops being that they will take a very strong pressure of wind without overblowing. The fact is, that the harmonic-tube, having two synchronous vibrating columns of air, partakes of the nature of a pipe already overblown to its first harmonic, the octave.

harmonic-triad, s.

Music. The chord of a note consisting of its third and perfect fifth; a common chord.

har-môn-î-ca, s. [Greek harmonikos, from harmonia=harmony.]

Music:

1. A musical instrument formed of a number of glasses which are tuned by filling them more or less with water, and are played by touching them with the dampened finger. The less the quantity of water, the lower is the tone of the scale. The instrument is said to have been invented by a German, and was improved by Dr. Benjamin Franklin.

2. A small wind instrument. A mouth-organ. At the edge is a series of holes which conduct the breath to free reeds, like those of an accordion.

har-môn-îc-al, a. [Eng. harmonic; -al.] The same as HARMONIC (q. v.).

"They will soon conclude . . . that the harmonic soul . . . is merely a fiction and a dream."—Clarke's Fifth Reply to Leibnitz.

harmonic-curve, s.

Math.: A curve into which a musical chord is supposed to be inflected when put into motion so as to excite a sound.

harmonic-interval, s.

Music: [HARMONIC-INTERVAL.]

harmonic-mean, s.

Math.: A term applied to a mean between two quantities, as A and B, when it is double a fourth proportional to the sum of the quantities and the quantities themselves: thus $\frac{AB}{A+B}$ being the fourth proportional to $A+B : A :: B$, then $\frac{2AB}{A+B}$ is the harmonic mean.

harmonic-proportion, s.

Math.: The relation between four quantities when the first is to the fourth as the difference between the first and the second to the difference between the third and fourth: that is when $A : D :: A - B : C - D$. So also three quantities are said to be in harmonic proportion when the first is to the second as the difference between the first and second to the difference between the second and third.

harmonic-series, s.

Math.: A series of numbers in continued harmonic proportion.

har-môn-îc-âl-lý, adv. [Eng. harmonical; -ly.]

1. Ord. Lang.: In an harmonical manner; melodiously; harmoniously; suitably, fitly, by harmony.

"Intending to declare harmonically the harmony of the four elements of the soul."—P. Holland: Plutarch, p. 1,022.

2. Math.: In harmonic progression; as, a line harmonically divided.

har-môn-î-chord, s. [Gr. harmonikos = harmonical, and chordê=a chord.]

Music: An instrument played like a pianoforte, but sounding like a violin. The tone is produced by the pressure of the keys, which sets a revolving cylinder of wood, covered with leather and charged with rosin, in action over the strings. It has also been called piano-violin, violin-piano, tetrachordon, &c.

har-môn-î-cî, s. pl. [Greek harmonikos=harmonical.] The followers of the Pythagorean system of music as opposed to that taught by Aristoxenus. They were also called Musici. The Aristoxenians viewed music as an art governed by appeal to the ear; the Pythagoreans, as a science founded on physical laws.

har-môn-î-côn, s. [Gr. neut. sing. of harmonikos =harmonical.]

1. An instrument only used as a toy; it consists of free reeds inclosed in a box in such a way that inspiration produces one set of sounds, respiration another.

2. A musical instrument consisting of a large barrel-organ, containing, in addition to the ordinary pipes, others to imitate the different wind-instruments, and an apparatus to produce the effects of drums, triangles, cymbals, &c., so that the combined sounds produce the effect of a military band.

¶ Chemical harmonicon: An open tube, the air of which is made to sound by means of a luminous jet of hydrogen, coal-gas, &c., placed beneath the tube. The sound is produced by a series of small explosions which take place as the oxygen of the air combines with the hydrogen of the jets.

har-mô-ni-ôis, a. [Fr. harmonieux, from harmonia=harmony (q. v.).]

1. Of or pertaining to musical harmony or concord; musically concordant or consonant.

"Your songs confound
 Our more harmonious notes."
Cowper: Task, iii. 767.

2. Having the several parts adapted and proportioned to each other; symmetrical.

"By an harmonious sympathy promote the perfection and good of the whole."—Glanvill: Vanity of Dogmatizing, ch. v.

3. Living or acting in concord, peace, or friendship; agreeing in action or feeling.

har-mō-ni-ōus-ly, adv. [English harmonious; -ly.]

1. In a harmonious manner; melodiously; with harmony or concord of sound.

2. With just adaptation and proportion of parts to each other; symmetrically.

"How came the Asterisms of the same nature and energies to be so harmoniously placed at regular intervals."—Bentley: Sermons, iii.

3. In harmony or concord; with agreement or union of feeling and action.

"To see public and private virtues not dissonant and jarring, and mutually destructive, but harmoniously combined."—Burke: Present Discontents.

har-mō-ni-ōus-ness, s. [English harmonious; -ness.] The quality or state of being harmonious; concord, consonance, symmetry.

har-mōn-i-phōn, s. [Gr. harmonia=a fitting or adapting, harmony, and phōnē=sound.]

Music: A small instrument with a key-board, in which the sounds are produced by small metallic tongues, acted upon by air blown through a flexible tube. It consists of a series of free reeds similar to those used in the harmonium, placed in a tube shaped like a clarinet. The compass of the instrument is two octaves with intermediate semitones; the keys are arranged in a manner similar to those of a pianoforte, that is to say, all the notes of the normal scale are in one row and the chromatic notes in another.

har-mōn-ist, s. [Eng. harmon(y); -ist.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. One who sings or plays in harmony; a writer on harmony; a musical composer.

2. One who treats of and shows the harmony or agreement between corresponding passages of different authors. [HARMONY, ¶.]

"Of which obedience, his most precious death is, by our most excellent harmonist, declared to be the consummation."—Nelson: Life of Dr. George Bull.

II. Ch. Hist. (pl.): A sect founded by two brothers, George and Frederick Rapp, who emigrated from Wurtemberg to the United States in 1803. Soon afterward they founded the town of Harmony in Pennsylvania. In 1815 they built New Harmony in Indiana. The name of this settlement became celebrated through the place having been purchased in 1823 or 1824 by Robert Owen as a suitable locality for carrying out his views as to the reorganization of society. In 1825 the Harmonists removed to a new settlement, which they called Economy. They have community of goods, and consider marriage a civil contract.

har-mōn-ist-ic, a. [Eng. harmonist; -ic.] Of or pertaining to harmony; comparative.

"The harmonistic exegesis of the anti-Christic school."—W. Robertson Smith: Old Testament, lect. iii., p. 67.

har-mōn-ite, s. [Eng. harmon(y); -ite.] The same as HARMONIST (q. v.).

har-mō-ni-ūm, s. [HARMONY.]

Music: A keyed wind instrument whose tones are produced by the forcing of air through free reeds. The better class of harmoniums have several sets of vibrators, of different pitch, and of various qualities of tone. The stop called expression is a mechanical contrivance by which the waste-valve of the bellows is closed, so that the pressure of the foot has direct influence on the intensity of the sounds produced. A tremolo is produced by causing the wind to quaver as it passes through the reeds. The vox angelica gives a delicate, undulating tone, which is produced by two sets of vibrators to each note tuned slightly apart.

har-mō-ni-ūm-ist, s. [Eng. harmonium; -ist.] Music: A player or performer upon the harmonium.

har-mōn-i-zā-tion, s. [English harmoniz(e); -ation.] The act of harmonizing; the state of being harmonized.

har-mōn-ize, v. t. & i. [Eng. harmon(y); -ize.]

A. Transitive:

1. To make harmonious; to combine, set, or arrange according to the laws of harmony or counterpoint.

"A music harmonizing our wild cries."—Tennyson: Sea Dreams, 247.

2. To make melodious, harmonious, or pleasing to the ear.

3. To adjust, set, or arrange in proper proportions; to arrange so that the several parts are justly and fitly adapted and suited to each other.

"And bluest skies that harmonize the whole."—Byron: Child Harold, ll. 48.

4. To make in concord or agreement with other things.

"To seek the distant hills, and there converse With Nature: there to harmonize his heart."—Thomson: Summer, 1,882.

B. To restrain, to rein in, to keep in subjection.

"And every passion aptly harmonized."—Thomson: Summer, 467.

B. Intransitive:

1. To form a concord; to be in harmony or concord; to agree in sounds or effect; as, Two voices harmonize together.

2. To be in concord or agreement; to agree in feeling or action; to be or live in peace and concord.

3. To agree together in effect or result; as, The facts harmonize.

har-mōn-iz-ēr, s. [Eng. harmoniz(e); -er.]

1. One who harmonizes or arranges sounds according to the rules of harmony.

2. One who arranges or adjusts things in symmetrical order.

"The constant harmonizer of the whole world."—Cudworth: Intell. System, p. 489.

3. A harmonist.

har-mō-nōm-ē-tēr, s. [Greek harmonia=harmony, and metron=a measure.]

Music: An instrument for ascertaining the harmonic relation of sounds. It often consists of a single string with movable bridges.

har-mōn-ŷ, *ar-mon-y, s. [Fr. harmonie, from Lat. harmonia, from Gr. harmonia=a joining, harmony; harmos=a joining; arō=to fit or join.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The just adaptation of parts to each other, so as to form a symmetrical and connected whole.

"This harmony of mind

Where purity and peace imingling charms."—Thomson: Summer, 550.

2. In the same sense as II. 2.

3. The science which treats of the harmonizing of sounds.

4. A melodious or harmonious arrangement of sounds; music.

"Heaven's harmony is universal love."

Cowper: Progress of Error, 78.

5. Concord or agreement in views, feelings, sentiments, manners, &c.; peace; friendship; unity.

"Attentive to universal harmony, [he] often forgets that he himself has a part to sustain in the concert."—Goldsmith: Citizen of the World, let. lxvi.

6. A book bringing together and showing the agreement between parallel or corresponding passages of different authors.

¶ Harmonies of the Old Testament aim at placing the several books, or portions of them, in chronological order, showing how they illustrate each other, as, for instance, what light the prophetic books shed on the historical ones, or vice versa. Harmonies of the New Testament have it for one leading object to compare and show the mutual consistency of the four gospels. Another is to arrange the epistles in chronological order, and use the undesigned coincidence between portions of them and the Acts of the Apostles, to illustrate and confirm the authority of both. The earliest known harmony of the gospels is that of Tatian, a Syrian of the second century. Ammonius followed in the third, and Eusebius in the fourth. In 1537 Andreas Osiander published a similar work, as did Calvin in 1553, and other writers. Since then such harmonies have become numerous.

II. Technically:

1. Anat.: [HARMONIA, 1.]

2. Music: A just proportion of sound; musical concord; the accordence, concord, or consonance of different sounds which pleases the ear, or a succession of such sounds called chords. In its earliest sense among the Greeks this word seems to have been a general term for music, a sense in which our own poets often use it. But from its meaning of "fitting together," it came to be applied to the proper arrangement of sounds in a scale, or, as we should say, to "systems of tuning."

"The delicacy of hearing, and taste of harmony has been formed upon those sounds which every country abounds with."—Addison: Spectator, No. 29.

¶ For the difference between harmony and concord, see CONCORD.

¶ (1) Artificial harmony:

Music: A mixture of discords and concords.

(2) Close harmony:

Music: Said when the sounds composing each chord are placed so near to each other that no sound belonging to the chord could again be interposed between any of those already present.

(3) Figured harmony:

Music: Said when one or more of the parts move, during the continuance of a chord, through certain notes which do not form any of the constituent parts of that chord.

(4) Harmony of the spheres:

Ancient Phil.: The assumption of Pythagoras that everything in the great Kosmos must be harmoniously arranged, and that since the planets were at the same proportionate distances from each other as the divisions of the monochord, in passing through the ether they must make a sound varying according to the diversity of their magnitude, velocity, and relative distance. He thought that Saturn gave the deepest and the Moon the shrillest sound, as the one was farthest from, and the other nearest to the earth.

(5) Natural harmony:

Music: The harmonic triad or common chord.

(6) Perfect harmony:

Music: Harmony with untempered concords only.

(7) Pre-established harmony:

Metaph.: In the philosophy of Leibnitz a harmony established by God at the creation among all monads, which, excessively minute as they were, still represented the universe. Through their influence the body and soul act independently of each other, each obeying its own laws as freely as if the other did not exist, and yet with the same result as if they influenced each other. They are, in the opinion of Leibnitz, like two clocks, one formed to strike, the other simply to indicate the hour. They move in harmony, but each is independent of the other.

(8) Spread harmony:

Music: When the sounds of a chord are placed at such a wide distance from each other, that some of them might be again interposed between the sounds already present.

(9) Tempered harmony:

Music: When the notes are varied by temperament (q. v.).

har-mōst, s. [Gr. harmostēs, from harmozō=to fit together, to rule.]

Gr. Antig.: The name given to those governors of the Greek Islands and towns in Asia Minor sent out into a subject or conquered town by the Lacedæmonians during their supremacy after the Peloponnesian war; the governor of a colony.

har-mō-tōme, s. [Gr. harmos=a joint, and tomos=cutting; temnō=to cut.]

Min.: A monoclinic, subtransparent or translucent brittle mineral, occurring in twin crystals; colors white, gray, yellow, red, or brown; streak, white; hardness, 4.5; specific gravity, 2.44-2.45. Composition: Silica, 46.10-48.49; alumina, 15.24-17.65; baryta, 19.12-21.60; water, 13-15.24. It is found in amygdaloid phonolite, trachyte, in gneiss, and in metallic veins. Morvenite is a variety of it.

harn, s. & a. [A. S. heordan.] [HARDS.]

A. As subst.: Very coarse linen.

"Her cutty sark o' Paisley harn."

Burns: Tam O'Shanter.

B. As adj.: Made of flax hards; coarse.

har-nēs, har-nels, har-nes, har-neys, har-nesse, her-neys, s. [Old Fr. harnas, harnois, hermois=armor, from Bret. harnes=old iron, armor; horiarn (pl. hern)=iron; Wel. haiarn; Gael. iarnun; Fr. iaran=iron; Ger. harnisch; Dut. harnas.]

*1. Equipment for a man; the accouterments of a soldier or knight; arms.

"He taketh from him his harness wherein he trusted and divided his goods."—Tyndale: Luke xi. 22.

*2. Spec.: Armor.

"And a certain man drew a bow at a venture, and smote the king of Israel between the joints of the harness."—1 Kings xxii. 34.

3. The gear or tackle by which a horse or other animal is yoked to and made to draw a vehicle or the like; the working gear of a horse or other animal of draught.

"Or wilt thou ride? Thy horses shall be trapp'd."

Their harness studded all with gold and pearl."

Shakesp.: Taming of the Shrew, Ind. ii.

4. The apparatus in a loom by which the sets of warp-threads are shifted alternately to form the shed. The harness of a loom is termed the mounting, and the whole apparatus concerned in the motions of the warp-threads is the shedding. [LOOM.]

5. The salt beef issued to men in the Navy and the merchant service. It was so called either from a belief that it was prepared from horse-flesh, or from its extreme toughness. Called also Salt-horse.

¶ To die in harness: To spend one's life to the last in one's business, profession, or occupation.

harness-bearer, harness-bearer, s. An armor-bearer.

"Vellocatius his servant and harness-bearer."—Speed: Great Britane, bk. v., ch. vi., § 12.

harness-bell, s. A small bell, usually of globular form, and carrying a bullet, attached to some part of the harness to produce a jingling sound; a sleigh-bell.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāl, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, there; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, ōre, wōre, wolf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mātē, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fāl; try, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

harness-board, s.

Weav.: The compass-board of a loom, having holes through which pass the neck twines.

harness-cask, harness-tub, s.

Naut.: A large cask or tub with a rim cover, containing a supply of salt meat for immediate use.

harness-clamp, s.

Sadd.: A kind of vise used to hold leather while being stitched.

harness-currier, s. One who prepares or dresses leather for harness or saddlery purposes.

harness-hook, s.

1. A hook or bracket on which harness is hung.
2. A check-rein hook on the girth-saddle.

harness-leather, s. A kind of leather from which harness is made. It is blacked on the grain side.

harness-maker, s. One who makes harness, saddlery, &c.

harness-pad, s. A lining or soft wad beneath a saddle to keep the harder portions from galling the back of the animal.

harness-plater, s. A worker in electroplating, who plates the metal-work of harness.

harness-room, s. A room attached to a stable, warmed by a stove, and used for putting away harness.

harness-saddle, s. The part of the harness which rests across the back, and to which the girthing portions are attached. Upon it are the trotters and check-rein hook, and from it proceeds the back-strap, which reaches to the crupper.

harness-snap, s. A hook for attaching the reins to the bit-rings, the breast-strap to the hame-rings, &c.; a snap-hook.

harness-tub, s. [HARNESS-CASK.]

harness-weaver, s. A weaver employed in the manufacture of the more complicated patterns of shawls, &c.

har-nëss, *har-nesche, *har-nesse, v. t. [O. Fr. harnascher.] [HARNESS, s.]

*1. To arm; to dress or equip in armor or arms.
"Those that sleep in Jesus shall God bring with Him, and harness them with the bright armor of light and immortality."—H. More: Mystery of Godliness, bk. iv., ch. xviii.

*2. To equip or fit out for defense; to arm.

"They saw the camp of the heathen, that it was strong and well harnessed, and compassed round about with horsemen."—1 Maccabees iv. 7.

3. To put harness on, as on a horse.

"My horse is harnessed and chained to my plow."—Hale: Origin of Mankind, p. 50.

4. To place under control; to subjugate; hence, to harness Niagara Falls means to control the flow of water and utilize the great power.

har-nëss-ër, s. [Eng. harness; -er.] One who harnesses.

harn-pän, s. [A. S. hærnes; Icel. hjárn=brains.] The brain-pan.

"Weize a brace of balls through his harn-pan," said a second."—Scott: Rob Roy, ch. xxxiii.

harn, s. pl. [A. S. hærnes.] Brains.

ha-rō, *ha-rōw, *hār-rōw, exclam. [O. Fr. harō.] A cry anciently used in Normandy as a call for help or to raise a hue-and-cry.

"Harro! the flames which me consume," said he, "Ne can be quenched."—Spenser: F. Q., II. vi. 49.

harp, *harpe, s. [A. S. hearp; cogn. with Dut. harp; Icel. harpa; Dan. harpe; Sw. harpa; Ger. harfe; O. H. Ger. harpha; Fr. harpe; Ital. arpa. Perhaps connected with Lat. crepo=to crackle. (Skeat.)]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. In the same sense as II. 2.

*2. An Irish coin of the value of one cent, so called from the figure of a harp on it.

3. A screen or sieve for sifting grain and clearing it of the seeds of weeds.

4. An oblong apparatus, consisting of a frame filled up with parallel wires similar to the strings of a harp, and used as a screen for sifting sand.

5. A concave grating in a scutching-machine, through which refuse escapes as the cotton is beaten and driven forward by the revolving beater.

II. Technically:

*1. Astron.: A name sometimes given to the ancient northern constellation generally termed Lyra, the Lyre.

"Next shines the Harp, and through the liquid skies The shell, as lightest, first begins to rise."—Creech.

2. Music: A stringed instrument of triangular form, furnished with gut strings. It has a compass varying from three to six octaves and a half, according to the size of the instrument. There are several kinds of harps still in use: (1) The triple or Welsh harp, with three rows of strings, two rows tuned diatonically in unisons or octaves, the third or inner row arranged to supply the accidentals, sharps, or flats. The strings are thin, and the tone is consequently consonant with the character of the strings. This harp is derived from, and is almost identical with, the Irish harp. (2) The double harp, with two rows of strings is less inconvenient but equally imperfect; all alterations of the pitch of the strings having to be made with the thumb. (3) The single-action pedal harp, with one row of strings, containing a compass of nearly six octaves. There were seven pedals which altered by a semitone the pitch of the note to which each pedal belonged. The imperfection of the mechanism of the pedals involved the player in many difficulties, and rendered it in some keys quite useless. (4) The double action pedal-harp, the invention of Erard. The harp was a favorite instrument among the ancient Britons and the Anglo-Saxons. The old laws of Wales, the Triads, specify the use of the harp as one of the three things necessary to distinguish a freeman or gentleman from a slave. Pretenders were discovered by their unskillfulness in "playing of the harp." The same laws forbade a slave to touch a harp, either out of curiosity, or to acquire a knowledge of it, and none but the king, his musicians, and other gentlemen, were permitted to possess one. The harp was exempt from seizure for debt, as it was presumed that he who had no harp lost his position, and was degraded to the condition of a slave. (Stainer & Barrett.)

harp-seal, s.

Zool.: Phoca groenlandica or Calocephalus groenlandicus, the Greenland seal. The resemblance to a harp is in two large brown, oblique bands meeting near the shoulders, and then running separately along the sides and up the hind legs, where they become brighter, till they finally disappear in the white of the under parts. The hairs dry, close, and not woolly, except when the animal is very young. It is found in the Arctic Ocean, in Greenland, Newfoundland, Iceland, the north and northeast of Asia.

were also stops in some instruments, by means of which the tones could be modified by connecting the mechanism with or detaching it from the three, or even four, strings, with which each tone was furnished. The keys were attached to levers, which at their ends had slips of wood, called "jacks," furnished with plectra of crow-quill or hard leather; these struck or twanged the strings, and produced the tone, which has been likened to "a scratch with a sound at the end of it." (Stainer & Barrett.)

"If he the tinkling harpsichord regards
As inoffensive, what offense in cards?"
Cowper: Progress of Error, 148.

harpsichord-graces, s. pl.

[CIRCUS-HARRIER (2).] It is known also as the Moor-buzzard and the Duck-hawk. It preys chiefly on rabbits, water-birds, fish, &c. [CIRCUS.]

4. Fig.: An extortioner; a rapacious or ravenous animal; a plunderer.

"I am content to have purchased, by the loss of fortune, an escape from a harpy, who had joined the artifices of age to the allurements of youth."—Rambler, No. 192.

B. As adj.: Rapacious; ravenous; extortionate.

"Drive the harpy race from Helicon afar!"

Cowper: Ode to Mr. John Rouse. (Trans.)

harpy-eagle, s.

Ornith.: Thrasaetus harpyia. Linnæus considered it a vulture, and called it Vultur harpyia. Cuvier removed it to the true eagles, founding first the sub-genus or genus Harpia (q. v.), and by many writers it is still called Harpia destructor. Its crest is dull-black, margined with gray; the upper parts of the body and wings are mostly black, the under ones white, except a black collar round the neck; feathers of the legs white, with transverse bars. Immature birds are mottled, and have been described as different species. The harpy is a very powerful bird, about three and a half feet high, inhabiting New Granada, Guayana, and Mexico. [HARPIA.]

harpy-footed, a. With claws like a harpy.

har-pÿ-a, s. [HARPY.]

"He has spilt the hatted-kitt that was for the master's dinner."—Scott: Bride of Lammermoor, ch. xi.

Hât-têm-ists, s. pl. [Named from their founder, Pontian Van Hattem, a Dutch divine.]

Ch. Hist.: A sect which sprung up in Holland in the seventeenth century. Hattem is said to have denied that the death of Christ was an expiatory sacrifice, and affirmed that in his teaching he simply signified to us that there was nothing in us which could offend God, and in this way he made us just. Also that God punishes men by their sins, not for their sins. The sect afterward discarded the first name of Hattemists. (Mosheim: Ch. Hist., ch. xvii, sect. 11, pt. 2, § 36.)

"He hath neither Latin, French, or Italian."

Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, i. 2.

¶ Have is used largely as an auxiliary verb to form various compound tenses. In this use it originally had its proper force of possession, as in, I have found a knife, i. e., I have in possession a knife which had been lost and has been found by me; or in, I have received a letter, i. e., I have a letter which has been written to me. The construction was afterward extended so as to include cases where the possessor of the object and the performer of the action were not the same, as in, I have sent a letter. It is also used with intransitive verbs, as in, He has gone. Have is used as an auxiliary of necessity, obligation, or compulsion, with the complete infinitive; as, I have, I had, or shall have, to do it.

¶ (1) Have after: Follow, let us follow.

"Have after, to what issue will this come."

Shakespeare: Hamlet, i. 4.

Anat.: Of or belonging to Clopton Havers, an English physician and writer of the seventeenth century.

haversian-canals, haversian-tubes, s. pl.

Anatomy: Certain canals in bone, to which attention was first called by Havers. The haversian canals are the protectors of the blood-vessels constituting the nutritive system of the bones. In the spaces between the haversian-canals are the lacunae and their canaliculi. Every haversian-canal has a number of lacunae around it, connected to it, and also to each other, either directly or indirectly by the canaliculi projecting from them. The haversian-canals, as a general rule, lie almost parallel to the compact tissue; they are smallest near the surface of a bone, and largest near its center. The haversian system forms a network in all bones, long, short, flat, &c. There is not a pore to be seen in the articular facets of the femur or other bone covered by cartilage, not even canaliculi or haversian-canals penetrate, but all other parts of the bones are porous. The cancelli are formed by the absorption of the walls of the haversian-canals.

haversian folds and fringes, s. pl.

Anat.: Certain fringes or folds in the synovial membrane, considered by Havers to be mucilaginous glands.

haversian-lamellæ, s. pl.

II. Technically:

1. Anatomy:

The skull, or cranium, part of the head consists of an osseous ovoid capsule for the protection of the brain (q. v.). The face proper consists of the upper and lower jaws. The skull in old age becomes composito like the sacrum in the adult. The margins, or sutures, of the cranial bones, twenty-two in number, excluding the hyoid bone, correspond to the articular processes in the trunk. In youth the flat cranial bones are connected by a double lamina of cartilage; notwithstanding the junction of the margins, they grow by the increase of one cartilage and the ossification of the other. Like the arch in the movable vertebrae, we have the arch in the head; in the lower part there are bones physiologically connected with the head bones of the neck. There are three segments in the head:—(a) The posterior, beginning from the cervical vertebrae below the occipital segment, consisting of a single bone, in reality four bones; a part of it lies at the base of the cranium at the back of the face, but the greater part extends up the back of the cranium. It consists of a ring, lateral sides, and an arch. (b) The anterior, consisting of the frontal and ethmoid bones. The only vestige here of the vertebral foramen, is the Foramen Cæcum. (c) The central segment; in the middle line below, and cut in two halves by the mesial plane, is the sphenoid bone, but along with it are two bones, the temporal, attached to its outer portions or great wings, composing the basis of the arch completed by the two parietal bones. These segments are divided by the lambdoidal sutures and coronal. The head is divided into a base and a vault, or calvarium; the inner aspect is called the cerebral, the other the superficial, external, &c., aspect. The bone on the outside of the cranium is not so dense as it is on the inside, in accordance with a law of construction in all animal and vegetable bodies, a law of part, and a law of place. Some anatomists count four segments, the two temporal bones constituting the fourth. [CRANIUM.]

(2) Comp.: The vertebrata have a head homologous in its anatomy with that of man. That of the Annulosa is homologous in functions, but not in parts. The Cephalopodous and Gasteropodous Mollusks have heads, the Conchifera, sometimes called Acephala, want them. Most animals of lower organization than these are destitute of heads.

2. Arch.: The capital (Lat. caput = a head) of a column.

3. Books, &c.: The top of a standing book; sometimes gilded that the dust may be blown off.

4. Carpentry:

(1) The top of a door, window, or bay; as, a circular head.

(2) The top-beam or ridge-beam of a bridge or trestle.

(3) The square block which slips on the stem of a gauge, and carries the scribe.

5. Chem.: The cover of an alembic or still.

6. Coopering: That which closes the end of a cask.

7. Found.: The sprue, sullage-piece, or riser on a casting, which is knocked off.

8. Fort.: The salient or advanced portion of a work; a work covering the end of a bridge.

9. Hydraulics:

(1) The vertical height or available fall of water from a dam, race, reservoir, standpipe, or forebay; or the difference between the heights of water inside and outside a dock-gate or lock-gate.

"In ordinary circumstances we speak of the pressure of a head of water, and we measure it by the depth of the water."—Airy: Pop. Astron. (6th edit.), p. 245.

(2) The up-stream end of a canal-lock.

2. Pl.: A name given to several races or tribes, notably to the Dyaks and Kyans of Borneo and Celebes, on account of their savage mania of hunting for heads, generally by nocturnal ambushes, and treasuring them as trophies. Tylor (Prim. Cult., i. 414) connects the barbarous custom with the rite of funeral human sacrifice, and says that the Dyaks considered that the owner of every human head they could procure would serve them in the next world, where their rank would depend on the number of heads they had taken in this. The present of a head is exacted from every aspirant to a Dyak bride. The influence of Sir James Brooke did a great deal to discourage head-hunting, and it is now fast disappearing. Kean (Journ. Anthropol. Inst., ix. 294) says that the practice also exists, with almost identical circumstances, among the wild Kirikis, Nagas, and Garos of the eastern frontier of Bengal, while traces of it are found among the Baltaks and some other races of the Indian Archipelago.

II. Anat. & Phys.: It is on the auditory nerve, the portio mollis of the seventh pair, situated in the temporal bone, that the sonorous undulations make their impression, the vibrations being propagated through the surrounding medium, generally air, by the corresponding waves or undulations they produce in it. A slight laxity of the membrana tympani is usual, permitting vibrations in accordance with grave or deep tones; by the action of the tensor tympani this may be tightened so as to vibrate with sharper or higher tones. This sense may be increased by cultivation, as in the case of musicians, and in people exposed to danger, or living by hunting. The pitch depends on the number of vibrations in a given time, the high notes being the quickest, and the low the slowest. The strength or loudness depends on the force and extent of the vibrations. The timbre or quality of musical sounds, as of the flute, violin, &c., all sounding a note of the same pitch, depends on differences of form in the undulations.
